We attempted to inform all the landowners who may be affected along the right of way, of this difference; indeed, we issued two bulletins to try to explain in a little more detail not only the difference but what was, in fact, their rights under the federal law, which will be the law used for the acquisition of land, or easements to land, in this case. I believe it is fair to say that many landowners were confused about their rights, because they are significantly different from those under provincial law. Indeed, they were concerned because the Railway Act is what is used as the federal law for the acquisition of pipeline easements. Examination of that act led the committee to believe that it is antiquated, and had probably never been appropriate for the acquisition of easements, where you do not take title to the land in fee simple, but take an easement to do certain things, with the land title in fee simple remaining in the hands of the owner.

We were also made aware of the fact that the Canada Law Reform Commission had reported as far back as 1974 that the landowners' position under the federal statute was untenable. It went on to explain a number of things that ought to be changed.

It is certainly not my purpose tonight to blame anybody, or to find someone who failed to draft amendments to the National Energy Board Act so that it would strengthen the position of landowners in negotiating agreements or, indeed, strengthen their rights if expropriation is required. Perhaps it can be simply said that although the Law Reform Commission and others recognized several years ago that there are inadequacies in the law from the landowners' point of view, no one got around to putting together an acceptable set of amendments to the National Energy Board Act to bring it up to date.

The committee, therefore, decided it should undertake this task and examine the various provincial expropriation acts and the federal Expropriation Act—which, incidentally, is a far more modern statute as far as conditions and circumstances in the 1970s are concerned. If my memory serves me correctly, the Expropriation Act was amended in a significant way in 1970. We also examined the Surface Rights Act and the acquisition procedures in several of the provinces, particularly Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan where most of the pipelines, and particularly the gathering systems, are in place. It follows, therefore, that these provinces and the people involved have had much more experience in this matter than those in other parts of Canada.

There has been prepared, and presented to the committee today, a set of proposals that could eventually comprise a bill to be introduced in this house which would repeal section 75(1) of the National Energy Board Act and substitute something else therefor. I put it that way because section 75(1) simply says that where a pipeline company and a landowner are unable to reach an agreement, the provisions of the Railway Act shall apply, and it includes sections 145 to 184 inclusive, and section 186. Therefore, if that section of the National Energy Board Act is repealed so that the Railway Act or any other act do not come into play, it then becomes necessary to spell out all the terms and conditions that are required for expropriation procedure.

We went a little further than that, and set out a method of acquiring land which will involve such things as notification procedures that are not now provided for in the National Energy Board Act or, indeed, in the Railway Act. Honourable senators who followed the passage of the Northern Pipeline Act will remember that Section 18.1 of Schedule III requires 30 days' notice of the detailed routing of the pipeline be given to each affected landowner. That applies only to that one pipeline, and what we are proposing to amend is the legislation or the statutory provisions affecting all pipelines built under federal jurisdiction.

We would also have to put in such things as the statutory negotiation procedure. This is not provided for in the National Energy Board Act now, but it is a very important and, I suggest, modern part of the federal Expropriation Act. I hope I am not confusing anyone, because the federal Expropriation Act is an act which is used by the federal authority to expropriate lands for the government's purpose or for the public purpose. When we talk about expropriation under the National Energy Board Act, that act gives authority to a certain private company to expropriate land from the landowners.

We have also provided for an arbitration procedure. This arbitration procedure is similar to the arbitration procedure used in, particularly, Alberta and Saskatchewan, under their surface rights acts. We have provided in the proposed amendments for an immediate right of entry, if that is required, because we would not want to hold up the pipeline companies. If immediate right of entry is granted to a pipeline company to go on to a farmer's or any landowner's land, that should not, of course, prejudice his right to arbitration procedures to determine the amount of compensation that may subsequently be paid. Then there is the matter of the determination of compensation, the costs of appeals, regulations, and so on.

I just want to conclude this part by saying that hopefully we will be able to send out a package of proposed amendments so that both the pipeline companies and the landowners will know within a few days what the concept of it is, but not necessarily the exact legal detail or the wording. Certainly the branches of government, such as National Energy Board and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, as well as others, will have prior notice of what we are proposing to bring forward to this chamber some time after the recess.

We have also compiled a package of the pertinent sections of the existing legislation on which these proposals were put forward, because in the whole package of amendments there is really nothing completely new. It is being used in one jurisdiction or another at the present time, mostly in some provincial legislation with respect to arbitration procedures. However, we did want to put this together so that anyone reading it, whether a major pipeline company or a small landowner, will know that these proposed amendments are based on existing legislation somewhere in Canada, and that it is not something that has not had at least some trial period.

I want to complete my remarks by informing you that at least some members of the committee from time to time suggested that perhaps this committee should take into account the overall gas supply and demand requirements in Canada, and the relationship between that and this particular pipeline—such matters as the pre-building, the southern sections and that sort of thing. Because of the terms of reference, I do not think the committee had the authority to get into these other things. The terms of reference were rather confined to the activities of the Northern Gas Pipeline, the agency and related matters, but that does not answer some of the questions raised.

There is now, for example, an application before the National Energy Board for what is known as the Polar Gas project to bring gas from the high Arctic and some of the northern Arctic islands down through central Canada. There is also an application before the National Energy Board for what is referred to as the Quebec and Maritime Gas Pipeline to extend natural gas services from Montreal east to Halifax, and that part of Canada in between. We think that a way to provide the committee with means of looking into some of these other matters from time to time would be for the Senate to refer the estimates of the appropriate federal departments and agencies—such as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the National Energy Board—to this committee on a regular basis. This would give the committee the opportunity to call witnesses from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and from the National Energy Board from time to time for the purpose of gaining information about these other matters.

I have raised this in a more or less informal way with some senators, and they have advised me that it would require a change in the rules. I do not doubt it, but I think we should consider the merits of having these estimates referred to a specific committee from time to time. I do not want to get into an argument on it tonight, but I am sure that most senators would agree that there is a deep interest in specific matters like the pipeline and energy, and perhaps also in agriculture and other subjects, where witnesses called from specific departments would be a useful source of information.

I am sure it is well known to all senators that it is a common practice in the House of Commons to refer the estimates of each department to a specific committee considering general matters concerning the particular department. It is a common practice in the Senate of Australia to do exactly the same. As I have said, I do not want to make the argument tonight about what rules should be changed. There may be a conflict of opinion if we hold to the British system of having a specialized estimates committee. Another alternative we may consider is that a committee such as the Northern Pipeline Committee could perhaps be a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for this purpose, if there is a great deal of resistance to actually taking the estimates of a particular department or agency out of the hands of the National Finance Committee and referring them to another committee.

Honourable senators, this gives you a brief outline of the work of the committee during the past six or seven months. In conclusion, it is fair to say that if some of the plans that the committee envisages do materialize, then it is going to be a very busy committee during the months of February and March.

● (2040)

Senator Godfrey: May I be permitted a question?

Senator Olson: Certainly.

Senator Godfrey: I am interested in the statement made by the companies to the effect that they could go forward without any undertaking from the Canadian or United States governments. It is my understanding that Arctic Gas was told by a major lender, such as Metropolitan Life, that it needed certain guarantees from the governments or it would not advance the moneys. If Arctic Gas needed this, why would not the others?

Senator Olson: I hope I can accurately paraphrase what was said when Foothills (Yukon) first made that statement to the National Energy Board and then later to the Senate committee. They had looked into this matter and gave an undertaking that they did not need any underwriting from, in this case, the Canadian government, but I think they also mentioned the United States government. I suppose the reason is that they had satisfied themselves by discussing the matter with some large financial institutions, such as the Bank of America, the First Boston Corporation, and others, that if Canada was to be a connecting link between two states of the United States, and that they had, indeed, put this gas transporting facility into place, that there would be virtually no possibility of it not being a viable operation, providing that the return on the equity which went into its construction was on the basis of a reasonable rate of return.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator van Roggen:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Report entitled: "Canada-United States Relations—Volume—II—Canada's Trade Relations with the United States", of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was appointed in the last session of Parliament and authorized in that session to examine and report upon Canadian relations with the United States.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I would again ask that this inquiry stand. Since last August I have mailed to honourable senators a considerable amount of material, and I look forward to giving the Senate an updating of the committee's report. I also understand that Senator Grosart wants to speak on the matter, but he is on much more important business at this time. I would ask that this inquiry stand until after the Christmas adjournment.

Inquiry stands.

NOTICE OF MOTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, December 21, I will move:

That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, December 27, 1978, at 2 p.m.

Senator Flynn: I am willing to accept an amendment.

BELL CANADA

DISCONNECTION OF TELEPHONE SERVICE—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I was overcome by the revelation last week that the Leader of the Government in the Senate was interested in our bringing up more points that concern Canadians. I have several oral questions, and I would like to put one at this time.

In view of the dispassionate revelation by Bell Canada that it is disconnecting telephones left off the hook, which action would be detrimental to many citizens, and particularly to those who are aged and living alone, would the leader inform us whether the government is taking action to investigate this heartless cut-off of service by Bell Canada?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice.

Senator Marshall: When the leader is getting the answer, would he impress upon the government that, because of Bell Canada's monopoly position, it should be forced to disclose its policy on what can be termed a ridiculous, greedy action and lack of concern and responsibility for the Canadians it is supposed to serve?

Senator Perrault: I know that honourable senators do not expect me to comment on that statement, which could well form the basis of a speech by Senator Marshall. In saying that I am not being critical, but the honourable senator has offered editorial comment on his own behalf.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, some time ago I asked a question of the Leader of the Government concerning the 25 per cent penalty imposed upon those who at the time of cashing interest or dividend payments on bonds refuse to reveal their social insurance number. The former Minister of National Revenue, Senator Guay, who, I regret, is not in the house at the present time, is reported in a recent letter to a constituent to have given every evidence of having found a rather imaginative way of circumventing the problem.

Senator Guay apparently suggested that when one is required to supply a social insurance number and, for one reason or another, does not wish to do so, one can spare oneself a lot of frustration by merely making one up.

I was wondering if the suggestion represented the policy of the government with regard to this matter. At the same time I hope the government leader can give me a reply to the supplementary question I posed to him some time ago as to the amount that has been credited to the taxpayers and the amount which has been retained by the government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on December 6 Senator Flynn and Senator Smith (Colchester) asked questions relating to the use of the social insurance number for income tax purposes. I do have at least part of that answer today.

Senator Smith asked whether bonds sold or issued prior to the effective date of the legislation requiring the social insurance number when cashing coupons were exempt. I must advise that no exemptions were made.

Senator Flynn has requested a breakdown of the total tax withheld of $619,000 on bond coupons where the social insurance number was not provided between the amount for which taxpayers had been given credit and the amount remaining in, to use his words, the "government coffers." I regret that departmental accounting records are not maintained in a manner that would provide this breakdown.

Senator Grosart had requested a more substantive reply to his assertion that the use of the social insurance number in present circumstances is a direct contradiction to an undertaking by a former government that such use would never be made for this purpose.

Parliament approved the use of the social insurance number for income tax purposes in general and later for its specific use in connection with the cashing of bond coupons. There is little I can add to what has been said in this regard, except to emphasize, and here I quote the words of the minister for Revenue Canada, the Honourable A. C. Abbott, "that such use of the social insurance number assists in the equitable administration of the law."

With respect to Senator Flynn's statement that the former distinguished Minister of National Revenue, now a member of this body, suggested that certain creative endeavours be engaged in with respect to the social insurance number, I feel sure that the honourable senator would feel it fairer to have the former minister in this chamber to assist in formulating an adequate reply to that question.

Senator Flynn: As far as he is concerned personally, yes, but he can no longer speak for the government, and I was asking whether this was the government's position or policy.

Senator Perrault: I know of no official government directive which suggested that those unable to remember their social insurance numbers should arbitrarily choose a convenient number.

Senator Walker: In other words, it is not a lottery.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SANCTIONS AGAINST RHODESIA AND SOUTH AFRICA— QUESTION

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Before doing so, I should like to thank him for the holly he has distributed. I would suggest he put a piece above his own head and leave it there until the end of the session.

Would the leader be kind enough to accept a question on the subject of the sanctions against Rhodesia and South Africa which Canada, under its ebullient foreign minister, Mr. Jamieson, supports so wholeheartedly?

With Russia obviously planning the takeover of the entire Cape of South Africa, just as a beginning, of course, and with the Union of South Africa and Rhodesia being the two great obstacles in Russia's path, how can Canada possibly continue to maintain sanctions against these two countries, thus preventing them from properly arming themselves to withstand the forthcoming onslaught of Russia through its heavily Russian-armed local insurgents and imported mercenaries?

● (1410)

We are all against apartheid. That is how this thing started. That is why the aristocratic and socialistic Minister of External Affairs in Great Britain supports sanctions, and, we suggest, wrongly so at this time. We are all against apartheid, which was at one time the policy of both Rhodesia and South Africa, and, of course, many other developing countries of the world.

Now that both of these countries are successfully struggling to do away with apartheid—

Senator Forsey: Ho, ho, ho!

Senator Walker: That sounds like an Oxford man. So it is. It's the well-known Senator Forsey of Oxford. That is one of his greatest claims to fame.

Senator Hicks: Nonsense.

Senator Walker: We are all against apartheid, which was at one time the policy of Rhodesia and South Africa. That is what I was saying when I was so rudely interrupted. Both countries are successfully struggling against apartheid, and Rhodesia itself was on the point of introducing a form of self government satisfactory to the three African leaders who were doing their part to take over January next had not that civilian plane carrying civilians been shot down by the imported Russian arms of the insurgents. The insurgents caused the postponement of this takeover.

How can Canada, except with the support of such distinguished people as Senator Forsey, still persist with sanctions, because when the time comes, when the holocaust comes, and when they are killing the women and children by the hundreds of thousands, then we shall help them. But it will be too late.

I am suggesting that the Honourable Leader of the Government should bring this matter to the Prime Minister's attention at this time, when time is so greatly of the essence.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice, and I shall endeavour to bring to the chamber a policy statement by the government on this important subject.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for his answer concerning my question about the SIN number and the coupons on certain Government of Canada bonds.

As I understood the answer, it is to the general effect that this requirement of producing the SIN number or withholding 25 per cent of the amount of the coupon applies to bonds which were sold to the people of Canada on the basis that no impediment would exist to obtaining the interest due on the coupons. Is this policy not a breach of the contract on which those bonds were sold?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only reiterate the statement provided me by the minister for Revenue Canada, and I quote:

Parliament approved the use of the Social Insurance Number for income tax purposes in general, and later for its specific use in connection with the cashing of bond coupons.

That statement is made by the minister and is supported by facts. If honourable senators would like specific dates and references in legislation, I would be pleased to bring that information to the house.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the leader for his kindly disposition. I am quite well aware of the legislation to which he refers, but I again ask the question that he did not answer—and I suppose he may not, if he does not wish to. Whatever legislation exists, is it still not a breach of the contract on which those bonds were sold to the public of Canada, to demand now a SIN number or to withhold 25 per cent of the amount due on the coupon?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it most certainly is the view of the government that there is no abrogation of the law involved here.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SANCTIONS AGAINST RHODESIA AND SOUTH AFRICA— QUESTION

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. He took as notice Senator Walker's question. I wonder if he could tell us what that question was that he took as notice.

Senator Walker: My learned friend always has trouble understanding any question. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why he did not get here until this late time.

The question is very simply this—and I am speaking for myself as well as on behalf of most members of this house, and not as a party man. Will the Leader of the Government bring to the attention of the Prime Minister the question of sanctions against South Africa and Rhodesia at this critical time?

Senator Perrault: Unless I am otherwise advised, or corrected, I will take it that the honourable senator is asking about the sanctions policy of this government, and that is certainly a reasonable question.

Senator Flynn: You understood what Senator Royce Frith could not understand.

TRANSPORT

REDUCED AIR FARES WITHIN CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Last Wednesday, December 13, I asked him what the government's position is with regard to pressing for an expansion of the system of reduced air fares instituted in Canada during this past season by way of charter or by some other arrangement. The leader took the question as notice. I wonder if he could now advise me on the matter, since I understand it is under consideration right now in connection with the coming year.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question has been put to the appropriate officials. No reply has been received as yet.

FORESTRY SERVICE

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF WINNIPEG OFFICE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On December 5, 1978, Senator Roblin asked a question regarding the proposed closure of the Winnipeg Forestry office of the Department of Fisheries and the Environment.

The reply is as follows:

The Winnipeg office of the Canadian Forestry Service is a sub-office of the Northern Forest Research Centre at Edmonton. The Northern Forest Research Centre serves the western and northern region encompassing Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Northwest Territories. At Winnipeg there is a staff of six and a projected budget of $115,226 in 1978-79. The employees have been placed on surplus lists and will be accorded consideration for other positions in the public service under the Treasury Board's policies, announced November 10 by the Honourable Robert Andras, for employees affected by the recent cutbacks.

The Winnipeg sub-office did not conduct forestry research, but rather acted as a liaison office to the Province of Manitoba. Staff were responsible for transferring research conducted at other centres. For instance, they worked on identifying Dutch elm disease and combating the disease with techniques developed by the Canadian Forestry Service's centre at Sault Ste. Marie. Another example of the work is forest pest detection.

I have been assured by the office of the minister that arrangements are being made to ensure that Manitoba receives more direct support from the Northern Forest Research Centre and other forestry research establishments, such as that at Sault Ste. Marie.

TRANSPORT

WINNIPEG—SHERBROOKE-McGREGOR OVERPASS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable Senator Roblin asked a question on November 28, 1978, regarding the Sherbrooke-McGregor Overpass in Winnipeg. The question was:

Has the Canadian Transport Commission submitted a recommendation to the Minister of Transport respecting the Sherbrooke-McGregor Overpass in Winnipeg?

If that is the case, when was that recommendation made to the minister, and is there any indication as to when the minister might give his views on the matter?

The reply is as follows:

The Canadian Transport Commission recommended that a grant be made available to the Sherbrook-McGregor grade separation in Winnipeg on June 8, 1978. On December 6, 1978, the minister gave approval in principle to the project, indicating it could be eligible for a grant from Manitoba's Urban Transportation Assistance Program allotment.

The minister issued a press release on this subject dated December 6, 1978, which details in more complete fashion the position of the government in this regard.

The minister said, in part, that Ottawa had received opposing opinions from various individuals and groups in Winnipeg concerning the overpass and its effect on residents and neighbourhoods in the area.

Mr. Lang also said, "Because this project could involve federal funding, I am concerned that there be an opportunity for both sides to make their views fully known and felt. But this is a local issue and one that should properly be decided locally."

● (1420)

The minister also noted that, in addition to the Sherbrooke-McGregor Overpass, he has also given approval in principle to 15 other projects that could be eligible for UTAP assistance. The provincial and federal ministers may now select projects from this list for implementation. If honourable senators are interested, I have a list of the projects that are under consideration.

AGRICULTURE

PURCHASE OF GOVERNMENT GRAIN ELEVATORS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 29 last, Senator Austin asked a question regarding the purchase of government grain elevators, and that was followed by a question by Senator Buckwold on the same subject. Both Senators Austin and Buckwold commented on the offer of the Government of Canada to sell the six elevators in western Canada presently operated by the Canadian Grain Commission.

I have received a personal letter from the Honourable Eugene Whelan, Minister of Agriculture, who says, in part:

The decision to privatize these elevators was made as a result of the decision to cut government spending. There is another consideration; that is, that these elevators have never been used to their full potential. Hopefully, in the hands of private operators, they will be utilized more fully. They will continue as elevators licensed by the Canadian Grain Commission, and subject to the regulations of the Canada Grain Act.

Tenders were called recently, and bids will be considered after the closing date which is January 15, 1979. Until that time, it's not possible to release the names of companies that have made offers to buy. Interest in these elevators has been informally expressed by several companies, among them the consortium referred to in Senator Austin's question. As far as is known, no final decision has been taken by that consortium to build its own elevator at Prince Rupert.

[Senator Perrault.]

THE SENATE

PRINTING ERRORS IN OFFICIAL RECORDS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Croll, on December 13, complained about errors which he alleged had crept into the official records of this chamber.

Production of the Debates of the Senate is achieved during the night hours following the day of debate, in order to provide a printed "working record" as soon as possible the following day. A total of five such parliamentary papers are so printed overnight at the main plant of the Canadian Government Printing Office.

An average of 2 million characters are keyboarded during the night, and all production copy is proofread. The volume of work and the speed with which it must be accomplished is such that, on occasion, errors are not always detected in the process. This is why recipients are asked to accept the "next-day issue" as a "working record" only, with due allowance for the occasional error.

Revised and final editions contain all corrections found to be necessary at a later stage. The Canadian Government Printing Office, nevertheless, fully recognizes and continues to strive for parliamentary papers as near perfect as they can be regardless of edition, and they believe they can improve on the present situation.

I know that all honourable senators appreciate at the same time the generally high standard of service that is provided on a continuing basis by the Canadian Government Printing Office to honourable senators and members of the House of Commons.

TRANSPORT

REDUCED AIR FARES WITHIN CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the government leader regarding reduced air fares within Canada. I am wondering whether the government leader would include in his communications to the officials he mentioned the suggestion that a reduced air fare from some of the outer extremities of Canada to Ottawa ought to be put in place, thereby making it economically possible for all Canadians to visit their capital at least once a year.

Senator Perrault: The comments of the honourable senator will be transmitted to the responsible officials.

FORESTRY SERVICE

DUTCH ELM DISEASE—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for his reply to my question about the Winnipeg Forestry office. I have another question for the leader.

Can the government leader inform the house as to what facilities and assistance are available to the City of Winnipeg with respect to the fight against Dutch elm disease in that city?

The concern with the closing of the Forestry Service Office in that city is keyed to that point. I am sure other facilities are available to the City of Winnipeg, and I think it would be a good thing if we were made aware of just what those facilities are.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

TRANSPORT

WINNIPEG—SHERBROOKE-McGREGOR OVERPASS—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the subject of the Sherbrooke-McGregor Overpass. I think the Leader of the Government has a justified cause for complaint. Like him, I was able to read the newspaper report of December 6 concerning this matter, and I think he ought to complain to his colleagues that it takes two weeks to get the same report into this house.

AIR CANADA

FUNCTIONS OF CHAIRMAN AND PRESIDENT—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, for a long time Air Canada managed with the offices of the Chairman and President combined in one person. I note that recently a new chairman has been appointed for Air Canada, for reasons which have not been sufficiently explained to my satisfaction. Would the government leader be kind enough to give the house a description of the functions performed by the new chairman of Air Canada and the functions performed by the president? Perhaps he could also let us know what honorarium or other remunerations attach to those two important posts.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEARCH FOR MISSING VESSEL—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, on December 6 I asked a question of the Leader of the Government concerning the unfortunate loss of a fishing vessel, the Barra Cudina. I asked the leader to determine from the Minister of Transport whether an inquiry could be held, and it was indicated that an inquiry would be made that afternoon in an effort to obtain an immediate reply. Since two weeks have now passed and the concern is mounting, I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government is now in a position to reply.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no information on that subject as yet. A further inquiry will go forward.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF POLITICAL SITUATION IN IRAN ON OIL IMPORTS TO EASTERN CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Is he now in a position to inform the Senate whether regular oil deliveries have been made to eastern Canada from Iran in view of the political situation in that country?

Senator Perrault: No information has been received that would indicate an unsatisfactory rate of supply to eastern Canada.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES—QUESTION

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question respecting the use of the social insurance number for income tax purposes. Before putting my question, I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for noticing that I was not in my seat at the outset of today's sitting. I appreciate the fact that someone noticed my absence.

Supplementary to the question of the Leader of the Opposition pertaining to the government's policy respecting the use of social insurance numbers, I would ask the Leader of the Government to broaden his inquiry to include the government's policy respecting the use of social insurance numbers in the purchase of bonds.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, before putting a further supplementary, let me say again how sorry I was that Senator Guay was delayed in arriving in the Senate this afternoon. There is a verse in French that is perhaps appropriate, as follows:

“un seul être nous manque et tout est dépeuplé.”

With respect to the 25 per cent that is deducted from the proceeds of bonds when people do not provide their social insurance numbers, did I understand the Leader of the Government to say that there is no way of knowing how much remains in the treasury? It seems to me that this money must go somewhere. Perhaps it is used to reduce, in part, the deficit.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, to repeat, the honourable senator requested a breakdown of the total $619,000 withheld on the encashment of bond coupons, where the social insurance number was not provided, between the amount for which taxpayers have been given credit and the amount remaining in government coffers. In response to that, I said that departmental accounting records are not maintained in a manner that would provide such a breakdown.

There is a concern on the part of the government, of course, that those who benefit from interest on bonds should have that amount accurately taken into account when assessing taxable income. There is an obvious need by government to have a fair and equitable amount of tax revenue available for the numerous good programs supported by Parliament. If honourable senators who are critical of current policy have a better system, a better idea, to ensure a proper accounting of bond interest paid out, the government would welcome their thoughts on the subject.

Senator Flynn: I am worried about the amount that the government would eventually retain. Before the current system was adopted, there were records provided to the Department of National Revenue respecting those who cashed bonds. Under the system now in use, one could redeem stolen coupons for 75 per cent of their value by simply refusing to provide a social insurance number. It is, I suppose, a way of taxing the thieves. I want the government to come clean and tell us whether they want to share in the fruits of theft.

Senator Flynn: Yes, the fruits of SIN—double sin.

SANCTIONS AGAINST RHODESIA AND SOUTH AFRICA— QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question arising out of the question of the Honourable Senator Walker and the supplementary question of the Honourable Senator Frith.

Could the Leader of the Government, when he brings the information he promised on the subject of sanctions, give us some detailed information about the sanctions being applied against South Africa? I thought there was an aching void there, and I am astonished to hear that sanctions are being applied against South Africa. So I hope we shall get the details for the enlightenment of ignoramuses like myself.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will endeavour to bring an accurate statement of our policy with respect to sanctions and other measures taken against those regimes which may not meet with the approval of the Government of Canada.

There are other measures in respect to South Africa of which honourable senators are aware. Certain trade offices in South Africa, for example, have been closed, and various other actions have been taken. They may not, technically speaking, come under the heading of sanctions, but they are actions which are designed to indicate Canadian disapproval of certain aspects of that government's policies.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES—QUESTION

Senator Guay: I should like to put a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government following the question asked earlier by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the 25 per cent deduction from the proceeds of the sale of bonds if the SIN number is not given. Even though a bond has been sold and the owner has lost the benefit of 25 per cent of the proceeds, I would ask him to look into the possibility of reimbursement by the Department of National Revenue if at a later date the SIN number is submitted.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: I thought you had an answer for your leader.

THE HONOURABLE MR. JUSTICE DONALD RAYMOND MORAND

BILL TO AUTHORIZE GRANTING OF AN IMMEDIATE ANNUITY— SECOND READING

Hon. Andrew Thompson moved the second reading of Bill C-33, to authorize the granting of an immediate annuity to the Honourable Mr. Justice Donald Raymond Morand.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-33 is an act to authorize the granting of an immediate annuity to the Honourable Mr. Justice Donald Raymond Morand. The purpose for introducing this piece of legislation is to allow Mr. Justice Morand to resign his position as a member of the High Court of Justice for Ontario, and be appointed as Ombudsman for the Province of Ontario.

At the outset I want to congratulate the Government of Ontario and the Ontario Legislature for being able to attract such a distinguished jurist to take on as tough and controversial a position as that of Ombudsman for Ontario.

Perhaps I should also add a personal note. I have been interested in the role of the Ombudsman since I was a member of the Legislature of Ontario, and I have been interested in the work of a Professor Rowat who first wrote a book on the Ombudsman. I have followed with a great deal of interest the career of the first Ombudsman for Ontario, Mr. Arthur Maloney, and I have admired the talent, dedication and prestige which he brought to this important position while protecting the rights of the individual citizen caught in the morass of bureaucracy. I think he has laid a solid foundation, and that is something that the people of Ontario can be proud of. As I say, I congratulate both the Government and the Legislature of Ontario on their choice of Mr. Justice Morand to succeed Mr. Arthur Maloney.

By way of explanation of this bill, the Ontario government approached Mr. Justice Morand some weeks ago about the possibility of his accepting appointment as Ombudsman. A further discussion between Mr. Justice Morand, officials of the Ontario government and officials of the federal government followed, and it resulted in Mr. Justice Morand's decision to resign as a member of the High Court of Justice for Ontario to accept the appointment as Ombudsman.

At this point, the difficulty arose concerning Mr. Justice Morand's entitlement to a pension pursuant to section 23 of the Judges Act, which provides that the Governor in Council may grant an annuity to a judge who has attained the age of 65 years and has served a minimum of 15 years on the bench. At the present time, Mr. Justice Morand is 60 years of age, and he has served as a member of the High Court of Justice for Ontario for over 18 years. In the normal course of events he would not be entitled to a pension pursuant to section 21 of the Judges Act until he turned 65 on January 17, 1983.

The bill I am introducing today will overcome this difficulty. Clause 1 empowers the Governor in Council to grant an annuity to Mr. Justice Morand upon acceptance of his resignation, even though he is only 60 years of age. This provision will allow the federal government to begin annuity payments to Mr. Justice Morand four years earlier than would normally be the case.

Clause 2 of the bill goes on to provide that the Government of Ontario will reimburse the federal government for the annuity, and any other benefits paid to Mr. Justice Morand until he is 65 years of age. I am advised that an agreement in writing has been entered into between the Ontario government and the federal government, as contemplated by clause 2. Therefore, the net payment by the federal government will be nil until Mr. Justice Morand turns 65 years of age, at which point his normal annuity payment would have commenced in any event. I am advised that last week the Ontario Legislature passed an address providing for the appointment of Mr. Justice Morand as Ombudsman. His appointment will be effective in early January, and he will continue in office for four years, until he reaches the mandatory retirement age of 65 on January 17, 1983.

On retirement as Ombudsman, Mr. Morand will receive only his annuity payment from the federal government pursuant to the terms of the Judges Act. He will not be entitled to benefits from the Ontario government. I simply wanted to add that point to assure honourable senators that Mr. Morand will not be in receipt of two pensions on reaching 65 years of age.

As can be seen, the purpose of introducing this piece of legislation is to accommodate the Province of Ontario and Mr. Justice Morand so that he can be immediately appointed Ombudsman. Perhaps I should add that unanimous consent to immediate passage of this bill was given in the other place.

Honourable senators, with that explanation, I move second reading of the bill.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Thompson on the clarity of his explanation. I can only reiterate what he says, that we have a marvellous person in Mr. Justice Morand, a distinguished member of the Ontario High Court of Justice who, I think, would have eventually become Chief Justice, to take over this troublesome position of Ombudsman which was so skilfully filled by Arthur Maloney, a former member of the House of Commons.

• (1440)

Bill C-33 simply makes it possible for Mr. Justice Morand to accept the position at the present time; otherwise his pension could be delayed and diminished, and possibly on his death his wife might be unable to obtain her total pension. It is costing the federal government nothing extra. The Ontario government is making up the payments in the meantime until he is 65, and that is all part of the deal the Government of Ontario worked out with Mr. Justice Morand in arranging his salary as well.

So this is a red letter event for the Government of Canada. It is the first time in a long time that the federal government has made a deal which is not costing it anything extra.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, like Senator Walker, I wish to compliment Senator Thompson for his clear explanation of what is involved in this bill. He makes it clear that there is no special or double advantage to the proposed new Ombudsman for the Province of Ontario.

I do not know that gentleman, incidentally, but I have heard nothing but the highest praise for his competence and qualifications. However, I am glad of the opportunity to pay a little tribute, as did both Senator Thompson and Senator Walker, to our former colleague from the House of Commons, Arthur Maloney. As an eminent lawyer he performed at quite a financial sacrifice, I assume, the role of first Ombudsman in the province of Ontario. I wish to thank him primarily for his friendship, but also for the attention he paid, while he had that duty of people's advocate, to the many problems vis-à-vis citizens and government in northern Ontario, particularly problems of the native peoples.

Arthur Maloney and I, although we did not sit on the same side of the House of Commons, happened to be good friends, and I wish to compliment him for his political services beyond his legal talents, and also to extend the hope that he will continue, upon resuming his private law practice, to be as successful, not only in his own interests but in the interests of his clients, as he has been in the past.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I wish to put a question to the sponsor of the bill. It is quite obvious that the federal government is losing nothing in this arrangement, nor is it costing the government of Ontario anything, but it seems to me that it is costing Mr. Justice Morand something in that at age 65 he would be eligible to become a supernumerary judge with full salary. If he is no longer a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario at that time, he will be entitled only to the pension, which is two-thirds of his salary. Has that aspect of the problem been taken into consideration?

Senator Walker: Before Senator Thompson answers that question, may I say that Mr. Justice Morand is fully aware of the position, but he can struggle on because he will have his salary as an Ombudsman after the age of 65, and his wife upon his death will receive two-thirds of his former salary.

Senator Flynn: I thought he received nothing after the age of 65.

Senator Benidickson: May I ask a further question now? I realize Senator Thompson will answer all of these questions in due course. Is a supreme court judge not entitled to remain as such until the age of 75? Was not that the purport of Senator Flynn's question?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Benidickson: If he is obliged to retire as Ombudsman, is he not entitled, provided he is in good health, to resume his position as a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario?

Senator Flynn: Not if he resigns now.

Senator Asselin: I should like to ask Senator Thompson what will happen if Mr. Justice Morand dies during his period of service as Ombudsman of Ontario. What will be the privileges of his widow?

Senator Thompson: In connection with the first question posed by Senator Flynn, my understanding is that on retirement as Ombudsman Mr. Justice Morand will receive only his annuity payment from the federal government and not the Ombudsman's salary.

In answer to Senator Asselin's question, my understanding is that Mr. Justice Morand's widow would receive a pension, which I believe is 50 per cent.

Senator Asselin: If he dies before the age of 65, does his widow receive the same pension?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Walker: The amount is two-thirds, whether he dies or retires.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I want to raise a question about the bill. Incidentally, it is a bill I rather welcome, but I should like to draw attention to the French language version. In the English language version the reference throughout is to the Honourable Mr. Justice Donald Raymond Morand. In the French language version the reference is to Monsieur le juge Donald Raymond Morand.

My recollection is that the custom is to use the French equivalent of the term "the honourable." I hope that point is looked into before the bill proceeds to its conclusion. I have no desire to delay it unduly, but I should like the point considered. If I am correct in my assumption that the custom has been to use a translation of the English phrase "the honourable Mr. Justice," then I think that should be used in the French version.

Senator Thompson: As a matter of fact, Senator McIlraith, I put that very question to the Department of Justice, and their reply was that in the official reports of decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada and decisions of the Appeal Court of Quebec the practice has been to use the expression "Monsieur le juge". However, I am informed that no definite policy statement has been made on this question. In fact, when I spoke to one of the officials he told me that he assumed it would be "the honourable" in French as well as in English, in deference to the position of the judge.

In any event, the point has been brought to the attention of the department and I am sure a decision will be made on it, but they did emphasize that use of the expression "Monsieur le juge" is modern practice, and in no way is intended to derogate from the position of the judge.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the sponsor of the bill a question, which perhaps is necessary for me to ask only because I did not understand clearly what he said. I thought he said that because of its agreement with the Government of Ontario there was no cost to the Government of Canada and none, except the difficulty mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, with respect to the honourable judge. I did not quite understand how the payment of the pension and the salary were put together so as to make a certain package which would be received by the judge during his term as Ombudsman.

Senator Thompson: Senator Smith, I apologize if I did not make the point sufficiently clear. There is no cost to the federal government when Mr. Justice Morand takes on the role of Ombudsman, in that the Ontario government will pay to the federal government the annuity which Mr. Justice Morand is receiving.

If Mr. Justice Morand had not accepted the role of Ombudsman, the federal government would be paying his annuity when he reached the age of 65 anyway. The situation is that during his absence from the bench the federal government is being reimbursed. When Mr. Justice Morand reaches the age of 65, the federal government will assume responsibility for his annuity.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I understand that perfectly, and I thank the honourable senator for his answer. Apparently I did not make my question clear. To put it specifically: During the time that the judge is serving as Ombudsman, does he receive the annuity from the federal government, which is reimbursed by the Government of Ontario, plus a salary from the Government of Ontario?

Senator Thompson: He receives the annuity from the federal government, which is reimbursed by the Government of Ontario. He does not receive, in addition, a salary from the Government of Ontario.

Senator Flynn: Yes, he does. He has to. He has to receive at least the difference between two-thirds and the full judge's salary while he acts as Ombudsman. He must be paid another amount.

Senator Thompson: Initially, I thought that this was a simple bill, which is a mistake that anyone in the Senate can make.

Senator Flynn: You should have asked for support from Senator Laird.

Senator Benidickson: There are too many lawyers here.

Senator Thompson: Clause 2 of the bill provides that the Government of Ontario will reimburse the federal government for the annuity and any other benefits—I am assuming that those benefits are hospital insurance, and so on—paid to Mr. Justice Morand until he reaches the age of 65 years. I am advised that an agreement in writing has been entered into between the Ontario government and the federal government as contemplated by clause 2. Therefore, the net payment by the federal government will be nil until Mr. Justice Morand turns 65 years of age.

I recognize my friend's eminence as a lawyer, and I appreciate his comments. My understanding is that Mr. Morand will not receive two salaries, but just one.

Senator Flynn: He does not receive two salaries. He receives a pension from the federal government which the Government of Ontario reimburses. But, in addition to that, he must be paid a salary by the Ontario government. I think you will find that in the terms of appointment of Mr. Justice Morand as Ombudsman. There is no doubt about that.

Senator Langlois: We are not concerned with that.

Senator Flynn: We are not concerned with that, but we have to know about it to understand what exactly is the agreement.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I do not think my question was adequately answered. Perhaps I missed the point. I believe my question was: If Mr. Morand ceases to be Ombudsman at the age of 65, and if present federal legal provisions prevail, has he the right, if he is in good health, to resume his position as a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario, or is there an agreement that from this point on he receives only his pension?

Senator Thompson: My understanding is that he will resign from the bench, and his possible reappointment will depend upon the good offices of whatever government is in power at the time, and whether he himself would accept reappointment.

Senator Flynn: He would be too old. He could not be reappointed as a supernumerary judge.

Senator Goldenberg: If it makes the Leader of the Opposition happier, I would mention that I remember Mr. Justice Morand's father, who was a Conservative member of the other place.

Senator Flynn: Hearing all the compliments that were paid him, I suspected that.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I do not wish to delay this measure by persisting in my search for information, but I believe we are entitled to understand exactly what is being done here. This is not the only way to ensure that the honourable and distinguished judge receives an annuity—that annuity to which he would be entitled when he reached the age of 65. There are other ways of doing it.

The reason why this complicated way was chosen intrigues me. For instance, the statute could simply say that the pension to which he would have been entitled at the age of 65 is vested in him now and becomes payable. I think the house is entitled to know why this circuitous method was chosen.

Senator Thompson: I think I shall have to obtain a further explanation. Frankly, I was also intrigued by this, because I recalled to mind Mr. Justice Hall, who made a study for the Province of Ontario. Honourable senators will remember the Hall-Dennis report on education. As I understand it, Mr. Justice Hall was granted leave of absence to enable him to engage in that study, after which he assumed his former position. However, I am not a lawyer and I do not know all the facts.

It was suggested to me that the role of an ombudsman can at times become—and in this regard we can look at the incumbency of Mr. Arthur Maloney—one of controversy and very high profile when he is fighting for the rights of individuals. Because of the high profile and controversial position which an ombudsman has to assume, his duties are quite different from those other duties that a judge might undertake. Therefore, Mr. Justice Morand must clearly be seen to have resigned his position as a judge, because that is an impartial and objective position and not the high profile position of a servant of the legislature. That is the reason for this procedure.

I am not sure that I have given an adequate reply to the honourable senator. I shall try to obtain additional information for tomorrow.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, rather than delay this matter any longer, I am prepared to agree to second reading now, but perhaps tomorrow when he moves third reading, if that is the intention of the honourable senator, he could be armed with the information.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I would ask Senator Thompson if he does not consider that the bill deals with this matter in a more direct and simple way than that suggested by Senator Smith (Colchester). Senator Smith's procedure would not provide for a situation in which the retired judge is taken ill two years from now, at the age of 62, and has to cease his duties as Ombudsman. Under the present bill, his pension would commence immediately. If we were to follow Senator Smith's suggestion, there would be a hiatus of three years in the payment of the pension.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Not at all. If the pension is vested in him, it becomes payable on the same terms that would apply in any other circumstances. It becomes payable if he becomes disabled, or in any situation that is authorized by law. As I say, I do not seek further delay today.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, surely the answer to Senator Smith's question is that the Department of Justice likes doing things in a complicated fashion. If it has a choice of a simple or complicated way of doing things, it will invariably choose the complicated way. We have had other and notable examples of that.

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, to bring this matter to a close, there is a perfectly simple explanation. Mr. Justice Morand has said to the department, "I am not going to become Ombudsman now and lose my pension," so all they do is pay up his pension. The Ontario government pays the amount of money necessary between now and the time when he becomes 65 years of age and thus entitled to the pension, as a result of which he will receive an immediate annuity equal to the maximum he would have obtained at age 65. That is all that has been done. It is simplicity itself. It does not require any further research, so far as I can make out. Whatever other arrangement has been made by the Ontario government with him is, naturally, not incorporated in Bill C-33.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

● (1500)

Senator Walker: Now.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I am impressed by the joint sponsorship which is so generously offered by Senator

Walker but, in view of the question that has been asked, I will move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 21, 1978

On December 7, 1978, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, having examined the Bill S-9, intituled, "An Act respecting fugitive offenders in Canada", reported the same with certain amendments. The report of your committee was adopted by the Senate on December 11, 1978.

On December 19, 1978, during consideration of the motion for third reading of the bill, it was moved in amendment that the bill be not then read the third time but that it be amended. It was also moved in amendment that the motion in amendment be referred to your committee and that the bill be referred back to your committee for further consideration.

Having examined the motion in amendment, your committee now recommends the adoption by the Senate of the proposed amendment, which reads as follows:

Page 2, clause 2: Strike out lines 21 to 40 and substitute the following:

"(a) the murder, kidnapping or other assault on or restriction of the liberty of

(i) a head of state, including any member of a collegial body performing the functions of a head of state under the constitution of the state concerned, a head of a government or a minister of foreign affairs, and

(ii) a person mentioned in paragraphs (b), (c) or (d) of the definition "internationally protected person" in section 2 of the Criminal Code in the circumstances described in those paragraphs."

Having re-examined the bill, your committee also recommends that the bill be further amended as follows:

1. Page 3, clause 2: Strike out lines 12 to 14 and substitute the following:

"(b) any country or territory within the Commonwealth that though not sovereign and independent is not designated as a dependent territory pursuant to paragraph (a);"

2. Page 4, clause 2: In the English version only, strike out line 8 and substitute the following:

"has been so designated."

It should be noted that the amendment set out in item 1 above replaces the first amendment of your committee's report of December 7, 1978, and the amendment set out in item 2 above is an additional amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

H. Carl Goldenberg,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Goldenberg, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), moved that the report be adopted now.

He said: Honourable senators, I shall be brief. The changes recommended to this bill by the committee are technical and intended solely for clarification. It is for this reason that I ask that it be taken into consideration now.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE TABLED

Senator Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Wednesday, December 20, 1978

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which was authorized by the Senate on Wednesday, November 29, 1978, "to examine and consider the subject matter of Bill C-14, intituled: An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto", has, in obedience to the order of reference, examined the said subject matter and now reports that it approves of the principle of the bill.

Respectfully submitted,

Lorne Bonnell,
Chairman.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Bonnell:—and notwithstanding rule 78(3)—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Argue: Hear him out.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Bonnell: Please hear me out and then say no. I was going to ask that you be given an increase in salary.

Senator Flynn: Even to that, no.

Senator Bonnell: I move, seconded by Senator McNamara, that the report be taken into consideration now.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Bonnell: All right, then, next sitting. Does that suit you?

Senator Flynn: The 27th.

Senator Bonnell: Next sitting.

Senator Flynn: A report like this is tabled without debate, according to our rules.

Senator Bonnell: Then I wonder if the honourable senator would give me permission to make a short statement to explain the report.

Senator Flynn: No, we do not need it.

Senator Langlois: Next sitting.

Senator Petten: Next sitting.

Senator Bonnell: Next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator McNamara, that this report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Roblin: Before we discuss this matter, I should like to have some assurance that the proceedings of this committee will be available for members such as myself to study.

Senator Petten: They will be available.

Senator Roblin: Plus the report?

An Hon. Senator: Yes.

Senator Roblin: That is comforting to know.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Langlois: Next sitting.

Senator Flynn: We don't have to approve it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed to, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: No motion is necessary. It is only a notice of motion. He gives notice and that is all there is to it. We don't have to approve it.

Senator Langlois: I should like to ask the honourable senator to look at rule 78(3), which reads as follows:

A report which by its own terms is for the information only of the Senate shall be laid on the table but may on motion be placed on the orders of the day for future consideration.

That is all the honourable senator is asking for.

Senator Flynn: He is giving notice.

Senator Langlois: He is not giving notice. He has made a motion.

Senator Flynn: We are not on motions yet.

Senator Langlois: He just tabled this report.

Senator Flynn: On motions—

Senator Langlois: I would beg the honourable senator to take his time, "to hold his horses", as we say, and read paragraph (3) of rule 78, which for his information I am going to read again:

A report which by its own terms is for the information only of the Senate—

This is the very nature of the report.

—shall be laid on the table but may on motion be placed on the Orders of the Day for future consideration.

That is exactly what the honourable senator has moved, that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Senator Flynn: Motions, according to the rules, come only at the end of the Orders of the Day. If he wants to make his motion at that time, all right, but at this time it is too early. You should also read the rules.

Senator Langlois: I have read the rules. I know them as well as you do, my friend.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF POLITICAL SITUATION IN IRAN ON OIL IMPORTS TO EASTERN CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope the spirit of Christmas pervades this chamber before the afternoon is concluded.

Yesterday Senator Bosa asked a question, having asked previous similar questions, with respect to the possibility of a shortage of oil deliveries to Canada's east coast as a result of the Iranian disruption. I now have a statement from the Department of External Affairs on the subject.

● (1410)

To our knowledge, the political situation in Iran has not resulted in any shortage of deliveries to refineries in Canada. The situation, of course, will continue to be watched closely. I can state that there is in place an emergency oil sharing system among International Energy Agency members which include Canada. In the event of a disruption of Iranian oil exports which resulted in the IEA as a whole or any member country sustaining a significant reduction in its oil supplies, this emergency system would be activated.

THE HONOURABLE

MR. JUSTICE DONALD RAYMOND MORAND

BILL TO AUTHORIZE GRANTING OF AN IMMEDIATE ANNUITY— THIRD READING

Hon. Andrew Thompson moved the third reading of Bill C-33, to authorize the granting of an immediate annuity to the Honourable Mr. Justice Donald Raymond Morand.

He said: Honourable senators, I promised Senator Smith (Colchester) that I would have a reply to a question he raised, and accordingly I spoke to the department about it. They explained to me that the agreement arrived at in connection with this bill was one that has been worked out between the judge and the Government of Ontario, and then with the federal government.

It was suggested by Senator Smith that there might be a simpler method. I asked the departmental officials: Why not just vest this annuity for five years? It was explained to me that that in itself would require another act. The desire of all the parties was that in the unhappy event of the death of the judge while ombudsman his widow would be protected. By this simple, clear approach, as Senator Walker so ably described it, they felt they had arrived at that objective.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I thank the honourable senator for his efforts to obtain an explanation relevant to the question I had asked. I appreciate the explanation. I will not take up any more time of the Senate on this matter, but I do know that a much simpler and more straightforward arrangement, and one that would have protected the widow, could have been worked out.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULES 44, 45 AND 78

Senator Langlois, pursuant to notice of Thursday, December 14, 1978, moved:

That until December 31, 1978, rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. There is a motion standing in my name which would follow that of Senator Langlois. My motion, if adopted, would adjourn the Senate until Wednesday next when it adjourns today. If this motion were adopted, we might not have any objection to the motion of Senator Langlois. Therefore, I suggest we deal with my motion first.

If my motion is defeated, then we can deal with his motion on its merits. However, as I said, we might not have any debate on his motion if mine, were to carry. I think it would be logical for the Senate to deal with my motion first.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am surprised to hear Senator Flynn asking for co-operation after he refused co-operation a few minutes ago. Just the same, my motion comes first, so I suggest we deal with it in its proper order.

Senator Flynn: I rose on a question of privilege. I did not ask for co-operation.

Senator Langlois: I did not say that at all. If you would only listen instead of trying to find an answer before I say anything.

Senator Flynn: You said that I asked for co-operation.

Senator Langlois: You are asking for co-operation so that your motion can be put ahead of mine. That is what you have just asked for.

Senator Perrault: Listen and gain wisdom.

Senator Flynn: I asked the Senate to decide on your motion after it heard my motion.

Senator Langlois: I am sorry for my honourable friend, but I am going to adopt the same attitude that he has been adopting. I will not yield to him. My motion comes first, so it will be dealt with first.

Senator Flynn: Non-cooperation is not new with you.

Senator Langlois: It is not with you either.

Senator Flynn: You are a stubborn mule.

Senator Langlois: Keep those remarks to yourself. They apply to you more.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., that until December 31, 1978, rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Have you anything to say?

Senator Langlois: I will refresh your memory.

On Thursday, December 21, I gave notice of this motion. It is quite normal at this time of the year that a motion of this kind be made. We are nearing the adjournment of the session, and we expect that an important measure will come before us tomorrow. It is the practice of this chamber, as it is of the other place, to ask at such time for a suspension of the rules indicated in the motion. It is a very simple motion.

[Senator Langlois.]

My honourable friend has been a member of this chamber and a member of the other place long enough to know that it is normal to make this motion at this time when we are about to adjourn for the Christmas recess. We shall adjourn some time tomorrow or the day after—or even next week, if his motion carries. However, I will not anticipate his motion at all. If his motion carries, my motion does not mean anything. I do not know why he is insisting on having his motion heard first. If his motion is adopted, I am in the hands of the Senate, as he is. We are all in the hands of the Senate, and honourable senators will decide what is right and what is wrong and what we should do today.

The only purpose of this motion is to try to expedite the work of this chamber and deal with an important piece of legislation, namely, Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, which is presently before the other place.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the matter is not as simple as the deputy leader would suggest. He did not tell the entire truth about this motion.

● (1420)

Senator Langlois: That is unparliamentary language. If you have any decency, you will withdraw that remark.

Senator Flynn: My statement was not that you did not tell the truth, but that you did not tell the entire truth.

Senator Langlois: That is enough.

Senator Flynn: I am going to add to your remarks what you neglected to say.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. My honourable friend cannot impute motives.

Senator Flynn: I am not imputing motives.

Senator Langlois: Your remarks are totally unparliamentary. If you wish to carry on in this fashion, you will be judged accordingly.

Senator Flynn: I will rephrase my remarks and say you did not tell the entire story.

Senator Langlois: That is much better.

Senator Flynn: My honourable friend says that that is much better. It is the same thing.

Senator Langlois: Perhaps in your mind, but not mine.

Senator Flynn: In my mind, yes, and probably in the minds of all other honourable senators.

The very reason for my motion is that we cannot expect to receive Bill C-14 before 5 o'clock tomorrow afternoon—

Senator Langlois: Four o'clock.

Senator Flynn: That is what you say. I think it will be at least 5 o'clock before we receive it. But even if it were 4 o'clock, honourable senators, by virtue of the deputy leader's motion, we would be forced to pass the bill through all stages in a matter of a few hours.

Senator Langlois: That is your interpretation.

Senator Flynn: Surely you are not suggesting that it is the intention to wait all day tomorrow for the bill, debate it for a few hours, and then adjourn the debate until next week. If you are in fact willing to come back next week, then both your motion and mine can be adopted. It is that simple.

Senator Langlois: The adoption of your motion would render my motion meaningless.

Senator Flynn: Not at all. By adopting your motion, we would be agreeing to proceed with first and second readings when we come back next Wednesday. In other words, we would not require the normal two days' notice. As things stand now, you are trying to impose a form of closure.

Senator McIlraith: No.

Senator Flynn: I am willing to bet with you, Senator McIlraith.

Senator Langlois: There is no betting in this place.

Senator Flynn: I know there is no betting in your caucus. I know how things go in your caucus. You have to follow the directions given by the government. If this motion is adopted, honourable senators can be assured that this bill will be passed tomorrow night.

Senator Langlois: Not necessarily.

Senator Flynn: My honourable friend says, "Not necessarily." If that is not his intention, then why does he not agree to my motion and have the measure dealt with in proper fashion next week? Assuming we dispense with the rules in question and proceed to consider this measure tomorrow evening at 5 o'clock, can we reasonably consider the measure, putting it through all phases of its passage, in the span of a few hours? Can we reasonably be expected to proceed immediately with debate on the motion for second reading, have a vote on the principle of the bill, have it referred to committee where amendments can be moved, have the committee report the bill back to the Senate, either with or without amendment, proceed with debate on the motion for third reading—and that is the stage at which we on this side normally would move amendments—all in a matter of five hours?

Surely we have been laughed at enough. To again adopt a servile attitude toward the government, and pass this bill tomorrow simply because that is the minister's wish, would lead to ridicule.

Senator Langlois: We are not asking that it be passed tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: If that is not your intent, then let's adjourn until next Wednesday and deal with the bill at that time. We can have first and second readings on Wednesday and have the bill referred to committee for either Wednesday evening or Thursday morning. If we did that, the committee could report back to the house on Thursday afternoon, and there could then follow normal debate on the motion for third reading. That would be the normal course of events.

If the motion to suspend rules 44, 45 and 78 is adopted, we could not then object to the bill's passage through all stages at the same sitting.

Senator Langlois: We are not saying that.

Senator Flynn: Well, if you are not saying it, why don't you withdraw your motion?

Senator Langlois: Why don't you read the motion first?

Senator Flynn: You say that until December 31 no notice is required for first, second or third reading or otherwise, that we can pass any bill without any day intervening, and without accepting any objection whatsoever from people who would like this discussion to take place in a normal way. The deputy leader said it was normal practice. I know that at one time it was, but the deputy leader will agree with me that I succeeded in convincing him, at least in the last session, that it was not needed, because we on this side have always co-operated when the request was reasonable. And I say that this request is not reasonable.

It is depriving this side, the opposition side, where we are small in numbers, of the only possibility of discharging properly its responsibilities. That is why I said before that this is the equivalent of closure, but it is even worse than closure in the other place, because there at least they have two days; they have one day for second reading and report stage, and one day for third reading. Here you are saying that you can push us to pass the three stages of this bill in a few hours. And that is what is going to happen.

If you tell me you are prepared, after the sponsor has explained the bill tomorrow, to accept the adjournment of the debate to next week by the member on this side charged with the main speech in reply to the sponsor—

An Hon. Senator: Why not Saturday?

Senator Flynn: A sitting on Saturday would be against the rule, and according to the leader there is no wish to sit on Saturday.

Senator Langlois: Nobody said that.

Senator Flynn: According to the rule when the Senate adjourns on Fridays it stands adjourned until Monday. Possibly you could add that to your motion, to dispense with the adjournment on Saturday and on Sunday too. If you want to make it absolutely complete, you could possibly amend your motion to say that we could sit on Saturday, Sunday and on Christmas Day as well. Why not? If you want to push you can push.

Again I ask if you would accept from the senator on this side charged with the responsibility of replying to the sponsor of the bill a motion to adjourn the debate until next week? If you say yes, then I will say let us adjourn right away. If you say no, then again I tell you that you are imposing closure on this group and you are preventing this group from discharging its responsibilities in the normal way, and really you do not care at all about the Senate. I cannot imagine that the Leader of the Government would not co-operate with this side. I have given him assurances that if we come back in the normal course next week, we can dispose of this bill normally; that is, enabling us to have a debate on second reading, to have the bill referred to committee and to have a normal debate on third reading. I have given that assurance, and I am willing to prove the point by voting for the motion of Senator Langlois, if my motion is accepted.

I cannot give a better assurance. If you do not agree with that, it means that you are trying to force us to pass this bill tomorrow between 5 o'clock and 12 o'clock. I know that this is what the minister wants, and that is what will happen if you have your way. If that is the kind of attitude you have towards the responsibility of the Senate to deal with legislation in a proper way, well, I leave you the responsibility; but I certainly will not concur in that attitude. Indeed, I denounce that attitude and I suggest that possibly Bill C-60 should be reintroduced in its original form.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we have listened with interest and a good deal of courtesy to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. I find it rather intriguing that the honourable senator would invoke parliamentary tradition and talk in terms of the rights of the opposition, the rights of free speech, and all the rest of it, after refusing the most elementary type of courtesy to the chairman of a committee which has painstakingly investigated the subject matter of this bill over many days. I cannot conceive of a worse discourtesy by a leader of an opposition group. I have never in all the time I have served in legislatures and in the other place witnessed such a discourtesy, where the respected chairman of a respected all-party committee is denied the opportunity to explain even in a preliminary manner what that committee has attempted to do with an important bill over a number of days.

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: You know, honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: Tomorrow.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if we are going to work together in this chamber, we must co-operate. At every stage of the committee investigation of the subject matter of this unemployment insurance bill there has been the utmost degree of communication between the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition.

Days ago, when it was anticipated that this would be a controversial bill in Parliament, it was agreed, and there was a consensus developed, that there should be a careful and detailed pre-study of the subject matter by the Senate so that no one could ever accuse the Senate of rushing through at the last minute such an important measure. That was agreed to by honourable senators.

Senator Smith (Colchester): No.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Not at all.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am talking about the consensus that was achieved.

Senator Flynn: The consensus means only the Liberal majority for you.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, would you remain seated? Other people would like to speak. I received—

Senator Smith (Colchester): Don't be so discourteous yourself.

Senator Flynn: Yes, you are the one who is discourteous.

Senator Perrault: I received no objections from any opposition senator to the procedure of pre-study which had, I repeat, the general support of honourable senators.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, that is not the same thing, and it is objectionable.

Senator Perrault: But here this afternoon the Leader of the Opposition denied the Honourable Senator Bonnell, who has worked many extra hours on this, together with members of his committee, the opportunity to explain even the basis of the report. He was denied that civilized, parliamentary courtesy. Senator Flynn stood up, and the word was "no."

Senator Flynn: Sure it was.

Senator Perrault: "Don't confuse me with the facts. My mind is made up." That was the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition. "Don't confuse us with the facts."

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, give us a few facts.

Senator Perrault: Now we are told that the motion under discussion is somehow an abrogation of freedom and parliamentary democracy and the traditions of this place. The parliamentary traditions in this place also establish the right of the majority, in the ultimate, to decide what is going to happen in Parliament.

Senator Flynn: I know that; you've made it clear so often.

Senator Perrault: After fair discussion and debate has been held in committee and in the chamber.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Fair discussion is all we ask for.

Senator Perrault: There is no abrogation of freedom involved here. When Senator Flynn served in the Diefenbaker administration precisely the same motions were brought in at Easter and Christmas, and the honourable senator is fully aware of that fact.

Senator Flynn: It was the wish of the majority at that time.

Senator Perrault: He is fully aware of that fact and so we need no fallacious statement here this afternoon that somehow this motion violates some parliamentary tradition. It is not closure. It denies no basic rights. It is a perfectly normal procedure designed to expedite the business of Parliament for good and valid reasons after there has been a fair and full discussion of important proposals.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Then let's have a full discussion. That's what we want.

Senator Perrault: So let not the opposition dare to plead that somehow their rights are being trampled under. Increasingly, these tactics appear to be a parliamentary ploy designed to embarrass the government and the members on the government side. We cannot accept the opposition's proposals.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I yield to my colleague.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend.

Honourable senators, I have up to this point taken no part in discussions of the rules of this chamber, for the obvious reason that as a relatively new member of the Senate I cannot claim to have the same familiarity with either the word or the tradition under which this body sees fit to conduct its affairs. But I think I may say, as a former parliamentarian in another place, that I know something about what the rules are for. The rules of any chamber of the parliamentary character such as this have two principal functions to discharge. The first is to conduce to the orderly, considered conduct of the public affairs, and the second is to protect the rights of the opposition to have its day in the parliamentary procedure. Those are the reasons why a chamber of this sort has rules, and those are the reasons why I am on my feet today to protest the remarks of the Leader of the Government, when we object to his proposal that we should abandon the rules for whatever purpose, that we are not within our rights in expressing our objection to such a move.

I was astonished to hear him criticize the Leader of the Opposition because he invoked the rules—which are there for the protection of minority parties in this house, among other things—to prevent the beginning of a debate on Bill C-14.

Honourable senators, so far as I am concerned, I have not received to this moment the full proceedings of the committee, so I do not know what went on at its meetings. How, then, is it expected that opposition senators can discharge their duty if they do not object to the commencement of the debate on Bill C-14? To say that that was discourteous, was disaccommodating, or unco-operative, on the part of my honourable friend, indicates a strange view of what rules are for in a house of this character. I suggest that when we are dealing, as Bill C-14 purports to deal, with perhaps the most important matter that has been before this chamber since this session began last October, we would be derelict in our duty if we did not take seriously our responsibility to familiarize ourselves with what has been going on, so that we can take a proper part in the debate.

Therefore I am one of those who agree with my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, in saying that we should invoke the rule, and that is all we did. The rule is there for a purpose, to secure the orderly conduct of our affairs and to give the minority the right to have their say in this place. I believe there has been no flimflammy in the position we have taken in respect to this matter, and I reprobate the chastisement that my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, sought to inflict upon the Leader of the Opposition. It is a phony argument.

I come now to the question that is before us. My honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, put his finger on the crux of the matter by asking whether or not adjournments would be permitted. It is pretty obvious, from what we have heard so far, that it is quite unlikely that they will be permitted. So what are we being asked to do? We are being asked to come in here Friday afternoon and, between then and midnight on Friday, to proceed with all stages of this bill. The House of Commons has been at it since November 2, which is quite a long time ago. They have raised matters of complexity, with which this bill abounds, and I am sure that we might find that we have the same problem with it.

But what strikes me particularly about the proposal we are being asked to support today—that the rules concerning notice be eliminated—is the fact that we are being asked, in the few hours on Friday, to go through all stages of the bill, namely, second reading, the committee stage and third reading. If someone will tell me that we will be allowed the right of adjournment, that the government will not prevent us from having an adjournment, then that is another thing.

The other day, however, along with some other members of this house, I had to undergo the humiliation of hearing the Leader of the Government of Canada proclaim, by means of Bill C-60, that this house was not discharging its duties in an effective way. I do not know how it affects the more senior members of this house, but I, as a junior one, found it humiliating to be held up to public obloquy in that fashion.

One of the things we are supposed to do in this house is to give sober second thought to legislative measures put before us, and I defy anyone to tell me how we can do that if we have to deal with this bill in the way that has been suggested.

I am not in favour of filibustering in this chamber. There is a place for filibusters, but it is not here. We do not proceed on that basis. No one on this side is interested in delay for delay's sake, and we are not interested in filibustering this bill. What we are interested in is giving the bill careful consideration, and I think the assurance that my leader has given as to the course we would take if allowed to proceed in the normal fashion is certainly adequate to convince members of this house that we should do as he suggested.

I repeat that we are not interested in delay for delay's sake. What we are interested in is a careful consideration of this bill, which is going to affect 1,800,000 citizens of this country. That is a lot of Canadians. This is the most important matter that has come before us this session. It involves the rerouting of about $1 billion, more or less, of public moneys, and is something, it seems to me, that cannot be disposed of in the rather abbreviated fashion that has been suggested to us today.

I want to say to my honourable friends that the purpose of the rules in this house is to enable us to conduct our business in an orderly fashion, and to protect the right of the opposition to have its say. I say again to the members of this chamber that the opposition is not interested in delay for delay's sake, or in conducting a filibuster. I am sure I would not be going beyond my brief if I were to say that we would be willing to accept any reasonable proposal that the members opposite might like to make, in order to be sure that these matters will be dealt with in a way that will bring credit to all of us.

This Senate is too often referred to as rubber stamp. This Senate is held up too often as a sort of necessary hurdle over which bills must be pushed, the implication of our critics being: In good times we need not bother, but at times such as we have at the present, with the session drawing to its end, we can push them to the wall and they are going to do as we wish. That is not my idea of how the Senate of Canada ought to conduct its affairs. The Senate of Canada should conduct its affairs in a deliberate and effective way so that we can properly do our duty.

I appeal to the Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell us we can have an adjournment. If we can do that, I am sure all these other problems we have been talking about will fall to the ground. Without that assurance I, for one, cannot support this motion.

Senator Langlois: I know that in rising at this time I shall be launching myself upon troubled waters, but I grew used to that during my time in the navy.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Langlois: I am not adjourning the debate. The honourable senator member may speak. There is no closing of the debate at this stage.

Senator Roblin: I rise on a point of order. Please instruct me on this matter. Is it proper for the gentleman who proposed the motion to speak other than at the opening and the closing of the debate?

Senator Langlois: I am allowed to answer questions put by the Leader of the Opposition and yourself. This is my right, and I do not think anybody can challenge it. I am not closing the debate. I could have delayed answering your questions until the end of the debate, but I am not going to do that. This is my choice, and I hope I am going to be allowed the courtesy of following this course of action now.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on the point of order there is no problem but if, under the rules, the sponsor closes the debate—

Senator Langlois: I am not going to do that.

Senator Flynn: If questions have been put to you, you cannot intervene and answer them one by one. You are there to close the debate and give the replies at the end of the debate. Otherwise the proceedings would be completely disorderly.

I would ask you, Madam Speaker, to look up the rules. Does the rule of speaking only once in a debate, with the exception that the sponsor of a bill may speak on introducing it and again on closing the debate, apply to this kind of motion? If it does, I suggest that the deputy leader is out of order.

Senator Langlois: In order not to perturb any further the atmosphere of this debate, I am ready to yield, though not because I think the Leader of the Opposition is right. I yield, in fact, to the honourable senator from Colchester. If he wishes to carry on, then I will close the debate after that.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I have no objection if the honourable gentleman speaks now as long as he does not close the debate. However, if he prefers to wait until he hears the pearls of wisdom which I am going to place before him, I will appreciate his courtesy in that respect.

Honourable senators, we have heard a lot about courtesy. Let me begin these remarks by saying that I resent, as strongly as I know how, the lack of courtesy that was displayed by the Leader of the Government towards that distinguished parliamentarian, the Leader of the Opposition, in the rude, discourteous, unjustified and improper way in which he spoke to him. Furthermore, the honourable gentleman does not even have the courtesy to blush at his sin. He laughs at it. He enjoys it.

If one wants to talk about courtesy, one should be courteous oneself. I have rarely heard a more discourteous set of remarks directed towards a parliamentarian than those I heard the Leader of the Government direct towards the Leader of the Opposition. I say again that I resent his action. He ought to know better. The next time he does it, we will remind him of this occasion. This is not the first time he has done this, incidentally.

I repeat, we have heard a lot about discourtesy, but where did the discourtesy begin? After all, people who initiate discourteous conduct must expect to be met with it in return, human nature being what it is. The discourteousness began when it became clear that the Leader of the Government was not going—willingly, at any rate—to allow this matter to be properly considered; was not going to allow the matter, if he could prevent it, to be adjourned until next week, when it could be properly debated. That having become clear before this debate began, how could he expect any courtesy to be extended the very able, worthy and courteous chairman of the committee which did the pre-study of this bill?

That is where the discourtesy started. The Leader of the Government invited it, and apparently he got it, since he complains vigorously about it.

As my colleague, Senator Roblin, said, nobody on this side of the chamber wants to delay things for the mere purpose of delaying them. That serves no purpose. We do, however, want to have sufficient time to study this bill properly, and debate it in the ordinary way, and if, in order to do that, it is necessary for us to invoke the rules, then we are going to invoke them, whether somebody thinks it is discourteous to do so or not. We do not think it is discourteous; we think it is only every-day common sense. One of the few things in a legislative chamber, under our system, that an opposition can do in order to protect its rights, and in order to make sure that it discharges its duties and responsibilities properly, is to debate bills which are worthy of debate, to examine them through all their stages with care, with such reasonableness as it is capable of mustering, which generally means with as much reasonableness as its friends opposite can muster.

The Leader of the Government made an assertion which, I am sure, on reflection he will realize is not quite accurate. As I understood him, he said that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science was authorized to study this bill, and that is true. We agreed that it should study it. He then went on to indicate that this side had consented to treat that study as an adequate study of the bill for the purposes of passing it through this house. We never agreed to that. We agreed to a pre-study, and that is an excellent thing.

I understand, although I am not a member of it, that the committee worked diligently and effectively in regard to this matter. It is true that the proceedings of the committee, except for the last issues, were distributed fairly promptly to all members of the house. But only the members of the committee, and the few extra senators who from time to time found the opportunity to attend them, know what happened at those meetings, aside from what is contained in the actual printed proceedings. However, those who did not manage to attend those committee meetings are not able to judge from anything, except the cold print, the intonations, inflections and the meanings that were conveyed. In any case, the committee had no opportunity to debate the bill or even the subject matter of the bill.

As I understand the procedure, it was a pre-study such as has been developed and used from time to time in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce where the committee endeavours to familiarize itself with the principle and the main details of a bill. The committee hears witnesses in order to have the bill explained properly and to save a great deal of time later on. I have participated in those hearings many times, and I must say they are excellent things just as I think the pre-study of this bill was an excellent thing.

However, never in the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was there any endeavour to treat the findings or the report of that committee after such pre-study as anything except a time-saver when the bill eventually came to it. Never was there an attempt to say that this pre-study could or should lessen the consideration or debate in this house.

Fundamentally, we oppose this particular motion because we feel that this report is just a preliminary step, and that seems to be clearly borne out by what we have heard today. It is a preliminary step to cut short the procedure for real study, real debate, and real consideration of this bill through all its stages from first to third reading. That is why we oppose this motion.

Honourable senators, I submit that in opposing this motion we are doing this house a real service. We are endeavouring to prevent this house from putting itself in the position where it is clear to all the world that it is not giving proper consideration to this important bill. We are opposing it in order to persuade this house not to go back on all the argument we have sincerely and vigorously engaged in about this being the chamber of sober second thought, and about this being a legislative chamber. I heard just as recently as the day before yesterday a considerable dissertation with which I agree, that this, first of all, is a legislative chamber, and that consideration of legislation is its first and most essential duty. I strongly believe that, and I believed it when I heard the assertion made. We are not going to live up to that duty if, in a few hours, we pass this extremely important bill.

I think no one can dispute the figures which my colleague, Senator Roblin, gave concerning the amounts of money involved and also the 1.8 million Canadians who will be affected one way or another by this bill. Is that a small enough matter to dismiss in a few hours, or is it a large enough matter to exercise our full responsibility and duty to give full consideration to it? I submit it is the latter.

Honourable senators, you have been very patient in listening to me, and perhaps I would be well advised to leave anything further I have to say for the debate on the motion of the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Lamontagne: I should like to ask the honourable senator to tell us how the rights and privileges of the opposition are reduced if the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, and other senators who may wish to do so, are allowed to speak today and tomorrow on the report of the committee.

Senator Asselin: Not today; the bill is not before the house.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I have no trouble with that question, and I know the honourable senator asked it only for information and not to trouble me.

I think I said why we felt it necessary to take the position we have taken. It is because, before we ever came into this house today, we had excellent reasons for being perfectly convinced that unless we stood up and used the rules as best we could to preserve our rights, and made sure the rules are carefully followed, we would simply be lending ourselves to a situation where this house would conduct itself unhappily and very much to its own disadvantage as well as to the disadvantage of the rights, duties and obligations of the opposition.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I rise merely to express my concurrence with the view that the debate on all stages of this bill between perhaps 5 o'clock tomorrow evening and midnight would be quite inadequate.

I do not wish to associate myself with everything that has been said by the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues, but I do wish to associate myself with that view, and to say that, in my judgment, one has to consider in this matter not merely the rights of the opposition as such, but the rights of senators generally. I wish to say firmly, clearly and emphatically that there is at least one member who is not a member of the opposition, myself, who has some observations to make on this bill which, of course, he could make on the report of the pre-study, but who may also wish to propose certain amendments which he could not do on the pre-study. I suspect there may be other senators who feel the same way. I am not privy to the views of all senators either on the government side or on the opposition side. Perhaps the opposition has no amendments to suggest. Perhaps nobody but myself has any amendments to suggest. But it seems to me that we should not take any action now which would foreclose action of that sort either by members of the opposition or by members on the government side.

I think it is too much to assume that members on the government side are unanimous in their approval of everything in this bill. I certainly am not. I certainly do not approve of everything in this bill. There are various parts of it which I think are highly objectionable, as I am prepared to explain at the proper time. But I think it is unsafe to assume that merely the rights of the opposition, important as those are, are in question.

If we can get an assurance, as has been suggested by Senator Roblin and by Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition, that the normal procedure will be followed, of allowing the spokesman for the official opposition to move the adjournment of the debate and take the matter up in the normal course when the house reconvenes, there will then be opportunity for debate on second reading, for proceedings in committee, with the possible moving of amendments, for the moving of amendments on third reading. In that case I see no objection at all to the motion of the Deputy Leader of the Government. But without that assurance I think there are very strong reasons why the house should decline to accept the motion which has been moved.

I am sorry to be once again odd man out on the government side, but I feel so strongly about the rights of members of this house, not merely opposition members but all members of this house, that I felt I could not remain silent on this subject.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the motion before the house at this time causes me a good deal of trouble. I do feel that in general the rules are there for the protection of the rights of individual senators, and that a motion, albeit supported by the majority, that removes those rights is something we should not go forward with without a great deal of consideration.

I am not impressed by the motion of the Leader of the Opposition, which says, "Let's adjourn and go home and come back next week," because there is a day tomorrow, and from the word we receive we expect that we will have this bill tomorrow. I would think a wise procedure would be to be in session on Friday and give consideration to that legislation when it arrives.

I can very well understand the position of the government, and of the Leader of the Government, who has a duty, I would think, to expedite the legislation and make certain, if he can—and I rather think he can—that it becomes law before the end of the calendar year.

Senator Flynn: No problem.

Senator Argue: I think we can all trust the good judgment of senators themselves, and that includes both the members of the opposition and the members of the government party, because if the official opposition should take it upon themselves to invoke all of the delaying tactics that are provided, if they wish to avail themselves of the opportunity, by the rules, then they might well postpone the bringing into law of this measure for a long time. I do not believe they wish to take that responsibility, so really in a sense what we are deciding is how we will distribute the debate or consideration of this legislation that will be forthcoming.

I think we should sit tomorrow. I think we should look at this whole question very carefully. If we came back a day or so after Christmas, I do not think that would be too inconvenient for senators, in view of the duty we have to perform.

I know lots of screams go up when they invoke closure in the other place. I think they were very justified in invoking closure; they are invoking closure under the rules; the rules are there, and there had been a long discussion of that bill before closure was adopted. It just seems to me, putting it rather mildly, that we are generally in error in endeavouring to have the majority remove the rules that are there for the protection of the rights of all senators, particularly when the government legislation is not, in fact, being threatened, when the question before us is how we shall deal with it in an orderly manner. Therefore I am afraid my position is that I am not able to support this motion.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am rather confused. I thought that what we were discussing was the first motion, which was the motion of Senator Langlois. During the discussion on that motion we heard a lot of comments about Bill C-14. Just to keep the record straight, so that when honourable senators vote on this motion, which is the first motion, I thought I should tell you what has taken place on Bill C-14 so that you will realize how important this motion is or is not.

Senator Flynn: It applies only to that bill.

Senator Bonnell: I am going to talk about the first motion. Bill C-14 was being mentioned so many times on the first motion that I thought I should put the record straight as to what Bill C-14 is all about.

Senator Perrault: They won't permit you to do it.

Senator Flynn: It hasn't reached us yet.

Senator Bonnell: I know it hasn't. If it had reached us last Monday it would be finished by now. On November 29 a motion was passed in the Senate:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of the Bill C-14, intituled: "An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

Your committee had several sittings, seven in fact, for the purpose of hearing witnesses and to study and consider the subject matter of Bill C-14. We heard the Honourable Bud Cullen, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, as well as his deputy minister, Mr. Marion. We heard from officials of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission. We also heard from Mr. Julien Major, Executive Vice-President of the Canadian Labour Congress.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order.

Senator Perrault: Let him speak.

Senator Flynn: I said on a point of order.

Senator Asselin: Who is the Speaker?

Senator Flynn: I want the house to know that we are not fools enough not to understand that Senator Bonnell is contravening the rules by more or less reciting his report. If he wants to put that on the record, it is his own responsibility, but I should like to let him know that I know what he is doing. When I objected to his comments on this bill I was merely applying the rules. What he is doing now is contravening the rules, and he knows that very well. If you want to continue, senator, go ahead. You have the support of the government majority here.

Senator Perrault: On a point of order—

Senator Flynn: On the point of order?

Senator Perrault: On a point of order, honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: Which point of order?

Senator Perrault: On a point of order. Let me point out that during Senator Flynn's remarks a few moments ago he contravened the rules of this place. Instead of speaking exclusively to the motion before us, he spent most of his time speaking to Motion No. 2 on the order paper, his own motion, about the reasons he would like to have the Senate come back next week. The Senate was very indulgent on that occasion and, in the usual generous and co-operative spirit which all senators usually attempt to demonstrate, permitted him to "bend" the rules of this chamber. It is to be hoped that the Leader of the Opposition will refrain from his harassment of a very respected senator.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, well, well! How the Leader of the Government can lead himself astray. He doesn't need much help to do that; he always goes so far afield himself. All the Leader of the Opposition and my colleague and I were talking about—

Senator Perrault: Is this on the point of order?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I am talking on your point of order, yes, and if you listen—

Senator Perrault: Is it on the point of order?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Yes, and if you listen you will hear about it. If you don't listen you won't. I give you credit for being able to understand it if you hear it. If you don't listen you won't hear it.

All the Leader of the Opposition was doing was giving the house the reasons why he was unable to support this motion, and why he felt he should speak against it and oppose it.

Senator Perrault: You are defence counsel, are you?

● (1510)

Senator Smith (Colchester): He doesn't need any defence. He is well able to take on the honourable gentleman and several more like him.

I am just saying that everything the Leader of the Opposition said was directed towards his reasons for not being able to support this motion; everything I said was also directed towards this same point; and everything my colleague, Senator Roblin, said was directed towards the same point.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not have a point of order, but I would like to continue my comments on the first motion, the motion of Senator Langlois.

Senator Langlois: Come to the point.

Senator Bonnell: As I have understood the discussion to this point, many honourable senators have taken different views and during the discussion of those views they have repeatedly referred to Bill C-14 and said that we did not have a proper hearing, did not conduct a proper study, did not have proper understanding, we did not have an opportunity to amend it, we did not have an opportunity to call witnesses. I just thought at this stage it would be worthwhile, in this debate on the first motion, not to go into my report. I would like to give that tomorrow, but today I would like to straighten out the thoughts of honourable senators on a few points concerning what has been said on Bill C-14. Therefore in order that honourable senators may make a proper judgment on the first motion, let me say that we heard the officials of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission; we heard Mr. Julien Major, Executive Vice-President, Canadian Labour Congress; we heard Mrs. Mary Eady, Assistant Director, Women's Bureau of the Canadian Labour Congress; and we heard the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Construction Association. We also read the proceedings of the Labour, Manpower and Immigration Committee of the other place and the remarks of the United Auto Workers, the National Advisory Committee on the Status of Women, the Minister of Social Services of New Brunswick, the Minister of Social Services of Ontario, the Minister of Social Services of Newfoundland, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, the National Union of Students, and the People's Commission on Unemployment. The committee held seven meetings, and conducted a very detailed study.

I would like to present the committee's report and tell honourable senators what happened, but I have been denied that privilege today. Rightly so. It is within the rules. Everything is fine. I am not arguing about that, but I thought that perhaps I would be extended the courtesy of being allowed to give you more information. That courtesy was not extended to me. You want to wait until tomorrow for that information, and that is certainly your privilege.

Senator Smith (Colchester): You are giving it to us now.

Senator Bonnell: No, I am not. I am just telling you who we heard, because they say we have had no opportunity to hear people.

An Hon. Senator: Who said that?

Senator Bonnell: Anyway, I would like to give a full report, but I am not going to do that because that would be trying to get the most out of the rules and doing more than what I, as a senator, should do. However, when you are considering the first motion I want you to be aware of the fact that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science did make a long and detailed pre-study of this bill, did hold many meetings, and did give many groups an opportunity to appear. In fact, all honourable senators were welcome to attend, even though they were not members, and all had an opportunity to ask questions. I do not want the allegation that the committee did not hear appropriate evidence to be used as a reason for voting for or against this motion.

Honourable senators, later, under Motions, I shall move that the report of my committee be considered tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: May I ask a question of the honourable gentleman who has just spoken? When will the full proceedings of the committee over which he presided be available? I have only been able to obtain up to Issue No. 5, and I believe there are one or two more to come. When will they be ready?

Senator Bonnell: The committee clerk is making every effort to have copies made available to all senators today.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, so many things have been said on both sides of the house that—

[English]

Senator McDonald: I wonder if I might be allowed to ask Senator Bonnell if his committee proposed any amendments to Bill C-14.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, in answer to that question, we did not have the bill. We were only studying the subject matter of the bill, and, therefore, we could not make amendments to it.

When we get the bill, and if it is referred to the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, amendments can be made at that time. So far, the committee recommends the bill in principle.

Senator McDonald: I probably phrased my question incorrectly. Were there any recommendations that will appear as amendments to the bill once the committee receives it?

Senator Bonnell: Not to this date.

Senator Perrault: Not from any party.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I shall not go too far in my remarks because enough oil has been poured on the fire this afternoon. Many things have been said on all sides which should not be repeated, especially at Christmas time.

In any event, I have only one question to put to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. When the minister appeared before the committee, I asked him one very specific question. I asked him if there were any special reasons why the bill we shall be asked to study should be passed before New Year's Day, before January 1, 1979.

Senator Lamontagne: Christmas day.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Asselin: No, I asked the minister why we should rush into passing this bill before January 1, 1979. The minister gave excellent reasons. He said that, above all, it was a financial matter since the government would stand to lose $50 million if the bill were not passed by January 1, 1979. He also mentioned forms, paper work, mailing problems. Be that as it may, the reasons he gave were excellent, to my mind.

But when the Deputy Leader of the Government tells us the bill does not have to be passed before January 1, 1979, he means in fact, not before Christmas Day.

An Hon. Senator: No.

Senator Asselin: Someone says no. But tomorrow, Friday, is before Christmas. So is Saturday before Christmas. And Sunday as well. When the Deputy Leader of the Government tells us we must absolutely study this bill tomorrow evening, at five o'clock—

Senator Langlois: I did not say that.

Senator Asselin: You did not say that?

Senator Langlois: No, sir.

Senator Asselin: Well, listen, if you did not say that, you are going to support the motion of the Leader of the Opposition and this will close the debate. But after what the Leader of the Government and his deputy leader said, it is obvious that we must begin to examine the bill at 5 p.m. tomorrow, when we receive it. From 5 p.m. till midnight, this gives us only seven hours to study such an important bill. Then after this, some will say that the Senate will be taken seriously by the population.

So, if we have not finished, we shall continue. Senator Lamontagne lives in Ottawa, of course. He can walk to Parliament Hill. But there are some people here who are forced to fly several hours, first to go back to their families, then to come back the next day or vice versa. Senator Lamontagne cannot set himself as a model. He lives in Ottawa. He can walk to Parliament Hill and look after his business here. It does not bother him at all, but there are some senators who are not pleased with that. This is why the opposition wants to make a serious study of the bill, and I think the Leader of the Government is in favour of a serious examination of bills which are sent to the Senate, so that the Senate can maintain its credibility. I think he is in favour of that.

An Hon. Senator: I do not know.

Senator Asselin: Someone says: I do not know whether he is in favour of that. In any event, I think he is speaking in good faith. I think he does want us to study bills seriously.

Honourable senators, in the few hours at our disposal we will never be able to study the matter seriously. It would also take the opposition by surprise, as we are so few, if we were forced in a seven-hour debate to summarize all our arguments, attend the meetings of the committee, move amendments, if any, and then proceed to third reading and passage of the bill. Is it reasonable on the government's part, which has a strong majority, to ask the opposition to make such an effort before Christmas? Would it not be better to support Senator Flynn's motion and come back next week to give this bill serious consideration? I think that would show that the Senate still serves a purpose.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with your permission, I would first of all like to answer.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you merely answering the question or are you closing the debate?

● (1520)

[English]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I am closing the debate.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I find myself somewhat at odds with what I perceive to be the position of the Leader of the Government in this situation, and I find myself even more at odds with the Leader of the Opposition, who I wish was in the chamber to hear my remarks. I have high regard for him personally.

Some Hon. Senators: He is coming.

Senator van Roggen: I am as concerned as any honourable senator that the so-called Christmas closure not be used to reflect on the dignity of this house and the manner in which it conducts its business. I certainly have sympathy with the remarks just made by Senator Forsey. However, we are faced with a real problem in that Christmas will soon be upon us. We anticipated this problem by having the appropriate committee study the subject matter of the bill. This procedure has been undertaken by several committees on different occasions, and it is accepted as a way of dealing with legislation at times such as this.

I criticize the Leader of the Opposition for not permitting Senator Bonnell to give a full and complete report—

Senator Asselin: He did it.

Senator van Roggen: —of the pre-study conducted by the committee.

Senator Flynn: He can do it tomorrow.

Senator van Roggen: I think we should have used the time available today, which we are presently wasting, to have a meaningful discussion of this matter—

Senator Flynn: You do not understand.

Senator van Roggen: I do.

Senator Flynn: How can we vote on second reading? This is the important thing. Try to understand that.

Senator van Roggen: I understand that.

Senator Flynn: You do?

Senator van Roggen: Let me continue. I commenced, while you were absent from the chamber, by saying that I disagreed, to some extent, with the position taken by the Leader of the Government, but even more so with the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition. I will deal with that in a moment.

In spite of the fact that I am critical of the opposition for not being willing to make full use of the time available today and tomorrow, by the same token it should be made clear that if this bill, having been considered as much as possible before the formality of its arrival here, cannot then be dealt with fully—

Senator Flynn: Formality?

Senator van Roggen: I suggest we use the time available to concern ourselves with the report on the pre-study of the bill. That time should be used as effectively as possible.

Senator Flynn: Is it the formality of the passage of the bill you are talking about?

Senator van Roggen: I am not talking about the passage of the bill. I said “the formality of its arrival in the Senate.” Do not misinterpret my words. I was not talking about its passage at all.

I do feel, however, that if the bill, with the co-operation of the opposition—which apparently is not forthcoming—cannot be reasonably dealt with by tomorrow evening, the debate should be adjourned until Wednesday. That is my position. I am critical of the opposition because they will not co-operate to use this free time—knowing that the guillotine is being used in the other place and that the bill will come to us tomorrow afternoon—to discuss it as broadly and openly as possible in the hope of enabling the Senate to adjourn for Christmas tomorrow.

By the same token, it should not be made to appear by the Leader of the Government and others on the government side of this house that we are going to ram the legislation through regardless. If it cannot be adequately dealt with by tomorrow evening, then by all means we should come back next Wednesday.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, the opposition leads me to believe that they do not know anything about this bill. It is obvious from their comments that this is a case of their not having read the proceedings of the committee that we have received from time to time. At the first meeting of this committee we were given an explanation of the importance of two clauses of the bill, the first of which deals with the guaranteed income supplement for senior citizens, who certainly need the money before the month of January. So, there is urgency in that respect.

The other item which I think is important—and I believe Senator Marshall on the other side is concerned with this as well—deals with the payments being extended to a spouse for a period of six months after the death of a pensioner. This would allow the spouse some adjustment period.

I believe those two provisions alone should have given the opposition reason for following the committee's proceedings rather closely so that they, too, would realize the importance of the bill and be in a better position to deal with it today, this evening, or all day tomorrow, if necessary.

Everybody is speaking about this matter now—I have been told I am not speaking about the right bill.

Senator Flynn: I thought we didn't know anything about the bill, but apparently you are completely mixed up.

Senator Guay: At least, it indicates my concern for the senior citizens.

Senator Flynn: That bill has been passed.

Senator Guay: Even though I am mistaken, my remarks still apply to the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues on the other side of the house who have shown little respect or regard for the importance of the bill that will be placed before us.

Senator Flynn: That bill has been passed for quite some time. Get up to date.

Senator Guay: It shows you I am reading all the reports.

Senator Flynn: But you still get confused.

Senator Guay: That is more than you do on the other side. I feel quite at ease in participating in this debate because I have not heard anyone on the other side say anything worthwhile.

● (1530)

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Langlois speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion now before the Senate.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, after listening to the debate which has taken place, I am even more convinced that the confusion surrounding this matter stems from the fact that a great number of my honourable colleagues have not taken the time to read the motion. To put the question in its proper perspective, I shall read the motion, notice of which was given on December 14 last:

That until December 31, 1978—

And that is not tomorrow or Saturday, but December 31, 1978.

—Rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills.

If this motion is adopted, the rules in question would merely be suspended for the period between now and the date on which we adjourn for the Christmas recess.

Let us now have a look at the rules in question. Rule 44 reads as follows:

(1) Two days' notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

- (a) to make a new rule or to repeal or amend an existing rule;
- (b) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General not merely formal in its character;
- (c) for an order of the Senate for any papers or documents not relating to a bill or other matter appearing among the orders of the day or on the notice paper;
- (d) for the appointment of a special committee;

(e) for the adoption of the report of a special committee;

(f) for the second reading of a bill.

(2) A like notice is required of any inquiry not relating to a bill or other matter appearing among the orders of the day or on the notice paper.

I am reading the rules in question so that the motion now before the Senate can be placed in its proper perspective. Rule 45 reads as follows:

(1) One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

- (a) to suspend any rule or any part thereof;
- (b) for the third reading of a bill;
- (c) for any substantial amendment to a bill reported by a committee;
- (d) for the appointment of a standing committee;
- (e) for an instruction to a committee;
- (f) for the adoption of a report from any standing committee;
- (g) for an adjournment of the Senate, other than the ordinary daily adjournment under rule 46(r) or that under rules 13, 36(1), 46(f), 46(g);
- (h) for the making of a substantive motion;
- (i) for any purpose to which neither rule 44 nor rule 46 applies.

(2) Where a senator wishes to correct irregularities or mistakes in an order, resolution, or other vote of the Senate, he shall give one day's notice, and a correction shall not be made unless at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of such correction.

Rule 78, the final rule mentioned in this motion, provides—

Senator Asselin: Just give us the page reference.

Senator Langlois: Rule 78 is set out on page 22 of the Rules of the Senate. It provides as follows:

(1) A report from a select committee—

Senator Flynn: Dispense.

Senator Langlois: There has been so much confusion in this matter, honourable senators, that I think I should take the time to read all the rules in question. I want to put my honourable friends on the right track. They have been off the track all afternoon. I think they need to be put back on the track so that they know where they are going. Rule 78 provides:

(1) A report from a select committee shall be presented by the chairman of the committee or by a senator designated by the chairman.

(2) A report presented to the Senate shall be received without debate.

(3) A report which by its own terms is for the information only of the Senate shall be laid on the table but may on motion be placed on the orders of the day for future consideration.

(4) When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

(5) When the report recommends amendments to a bill, or makes proposals that require implementation by the Senate, consideration of the report shall not be moved unless notice has been given pursuant to rule 44(1)(e) or 45(1)(f), as the case may be.

Those are the three rules which honourable senators are being asked to suspend between now and December 31. There is nothing whatsoever in those rules which would support the contention that has been made this afternoon that their suspension amounts to either closure or a filibuster. I would remind my honourable friends opposite that "closure" is a British institution whereas "filibuster" is an American one. That distinction should be borne in mind when dealing with legislation in a British institution such as the Senate of Canada.

Nothing in the rules I have quoted makes any reference to either prolonging debate or setting a time limit on any debate that might take place. There is no form of closure whatsoever involved in the suspension of these rules.

As I explained when introducing the motion, it is normal practice to have a motion of this type as we near the close of a phase of a session, or the close of the session itself. Because we are approaching the Christmas recess, and because we have an important measure which must be dealt with before January 1 next, I have moved this motion for the suspension of these rules.

Senator Asselin: You want us to pass the bill in five hours.

Senator Langlois: Nothing in the suspension of these rules would prevent any honourable senator from moving an amendment or from speaking for as long as he or she wishes, during the debate of this measure. Honourable senators can debate the measure for three or four days, if that is their wish. We will stay here until Christmas Day, if necessary, and through until New Year's Eve. There is nothing to prevent any honourable senator from giving full consideration to the bill when it does come before us.

What value would there be in adjourning this evening, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, and coming back to consider the bill on Wednesday next? Are we going to know more about the bill next Wednesday than we do now?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Langlois: My honourable friend says yes. Perhaps he will discuss it with his wife over the weekend, but I doubt that that will shed any more light on it as far as the legislators assembled here are concerned.

Senator Asselin: It is a serious argument.

Senator Langlois: It is not serious at all. It is ridiculous to take such a position. We are here to consider legislation. An important piece of legislation is to come before us tomorrow evening, and we should be here to debate it. Any honourable senator who wishes to consider the measure, can do so at his or her leisure.

The accusation that we are trying to rush this bill through is without foundation. The many references during the course of debate on this motion to the length of time over which this bill should be considered allows me to go beyond the scope of my motion. Reference has been made to the pre-study of this bill conducted by the Health, Welfare and Science Committee. I was amazed to hear my honourable friends opposite say that they did not have an opportunity to fully consider the bill, especially when I see from the minutes of the committee meeting at which the committee report was considered that there was not one single member of the opposition in attendance.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Senator Langlois: That is a fact.

Senator Flynn: Not only is it untrue, but it is hitting below the belt.

Senator Asselin: I myself was in attendance when the minister gave evidence before the committee, and, in fact, I asked several questions of the minister.

Senator Langlois: I am talking about the meeting at which the report of the committee was considered. The minister was not in attendance at that time. No member of the opposition was in attendance at that meeting, and I invite my honourable friend to prove otherwise. I am amazed when I hear such statements coming from the other side.

I was also amazed when I heard my honourable friends opposite—and I am very respectful of them; I respect everybody in this chamber. While I do not share their political views and I do not belong to their particular political affiliation, I have a lot of respect for them. I hope they have as much respect for me as I have for them. I was amazed this afternoon when I heard my honourable friends mention that tomorrow, if my motion is adopted, we will not be able to discuss this bill at length, and that we will have to pass it by 5 o'clock or 6 o'clock or by midnight. There is nothing whatever to that effect in this motion.

The Leader of the Opposition this afternoon asked, "How can we move an amendment?" Honourable senators are free to do that at any time. I do not consider myself important enough in this chamber to be the only one to decide if the Senate should or should not carry on a debate. I am in the hands of the house like every other senator.

Senator Flynn: Oh, stop joking.

Senator Langlois: You can stop joking yourself. You are the worst joker of the lot.

I have great respect for my honourable colleagues in this house, whichever party they belong to, and I know they will carry out their job because it is their duty to do so. For myself, I have voted many times against my own party both in this house and outside this house, and I would do it again if I felt within myself that it was my duty to do so. I think this applies to all my colleagues. They do their duty as they feel it ought to be done, and not because they have some party affiliation or any interest whatsoever in any matter before the house. We have a rule in the Senate to the effect that if an honourable senator has any interest in any question before the house, he should divulge it, and I would be the first one to do so if it were the case and I felt compelled to vote one way or the other. I would do that, or I would walk out of this house for the rest of my life.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if I might ask the Deputy Leader of the Government a question? Does he recall that it was proposed to him that if he would agree that the debate on the bill might be adjourned by the senator on this side charged with replying to the speech of the sponsor, we would willingly agree to this motion?

Senator Langlois: I am very pleased that my honourable friend has brought this matter up. I think if he had listened carefully to what I have just said he would understand that I am not the one to decide whether a motion should be adopted or not. It is the full house that decides that, and I am in the hands of the house like any other senator. When the motion of the Honourable Leader of the Opposition comes before the house, we will vote, each of us in the way we feel we should vote, and that will be the end of it.

Senator Perrault: In conscience.

Senator Langlois: We will vote in good conscience, believing that it is our duty to do so. I have enough confidence in, and respect for, my honourable colleagues to know that they will vote according to the dictates of their conscience and not of the dictates of their party.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, it is much simpler than that. Will the Leader of the Government say that he will not object tomorrow night if, after the sponsor of the bill has spoken, the spokesman on our side moves the adjournment of the debate? If he tells me that he will not object, then we will accept the motion. We will not require a vote.

Senator Perrault: I cannot, of course, give that kind of commitment. It is not possible.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne): We would not let him. That is our position.

Senator Flynn: You want the bill to be rushed? It will be after 5 o'clock on Friday.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Honourable Senator Langlois, seconded by Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., that until December 31, 1978, rules 44, 45 and 78 be suspended insofar as they relate to public bills.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

[Senator Langlois.]

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "yeas" have it. And more than two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Motion agreed to, on division.

ADJOURNMENT

MOTION NEGATIVED

Senator Flynn, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, December 20, 1978, moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, December 27, 1978, at 2 p.m.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not intend to provoke further debate. It is quite obvious from the vote that has just been taken on the motion of the deputy leader that my motion will not carry. I merely wish to say that my intention, in moving that we adjourn today, was merely to proceed in an orderly fashion, because that bill will not be before us until 5 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. If we adjourned now we would be doing so at the time we normally adjourn for the weekend. We could then come back next week, well able to deal with all stages of the bill's passage through this house.

● (1600)

In any event, so far as Senator Bonnell is concerned, if after this he wants unanimous consent to commence consideration of the report of the committee, and if he wants to discuss the bill this afternoon, tonight or all day tomorrow, that is up to the Senate, and I will not object. However, I want to repeat that I do not consider that kind of debate to be the same as that which we normally have on second reading or third reading. In my opinion, that should not take place in five hours.

I do not insist on the motion. I know it will be lost, but I would like Her Honour to put the question to enable those on the government side to vote against it, and in order that we may have the record straight.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Wednesday next, December 27, 1978, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it. The motion is defeated.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on the subject matter of Bill C-14, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, which was tabled this day, be taken into consideration now.

Senator Flynn: Leave is granted.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, about an hour or so ago I wondered whether there would be any Christmas at all for us in 1978, but I now feel that the Christmas spirit has come and, with leave, I am able to give my report.

Senator Flynn: We wanted you to be sure to get home.

Senator Bonnell: I thank the Leader of the Opposition, my good friend and colleague, Senator Flynn, for his kindness in giving me the opportunity to make this report today. I also wish to say that I am glad that on the first order of business I was unable to give my report and, therefore, was prevented from breaking any rules at that time.

Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science held seven meetings for the purpose of hearing witnesses and considering the subject matter of Bill C-14. As I said earlier, we heard the Honourable Bud Cullen, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, as well as his Deputy Minister, Mr. J. L. Marion. We also heard officials of the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, Mr. Julien Major, Executive Vice President of the Canadian Labour Congress, as well as Mrs. Mary Eady, Assistant Director of the Women's Bureau of the Canadian Labour Congress. We also heard the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Construction Association.

The members of the committee took an active part in questioning the witnesses, and a detailed study was held on most of the proposals contained in Bill C-14.

The committee was under a bit of a restraint in that the bill had not come before the Senate, and there was further restraint in that it was a money bill and we did not have the authority to amend it in a way which would increase the expenses of the Government of Canada.

Your committee was informed that Bill C-14 was one of the major features of the government's revision of its priorities. Apparently it is designed to effect changes to the unemployment insurance program, coupled with a major redirection of the government's employment strategy. The essence of the changes being proposed to the unemployment insurance program is twofold. First, the bill reduces some of the disincentives to work, which are present in the unemployment insurance program; and, second, the bill will encourage workers to establish more stable work patterns and develop longer attachments to the labour force.

Your committee felt that the bill would reduce negative aspects of the unemployment insurance program, as well as bring about a substantial cost saving to the government, which, we were informed, would be applied to other more productive programs. We were informed that the new emphasis would be on encouraging all Canadian workers to look for, accept, and remain at work. The minister informed the committee that the government had moved on several fronts to provide more work for people who would otherwise be on unemployment insurance. The employment strategy in 1979-80 will have an impact of $710 million, creating an estimated 113,000 work years of employment and training for some 360,000 people. We were informed that the government's new target for jobs and training in 1979-80 represents a 70 per cent jump over what has been accomplished in the past.

We were further informed that the government is starting up a job experience training program involving some $45 million, which should mean that some 58,500 young Canadians will be employed in meaningful work this winter.

Bill C-14 provides for major unemployment insurance amendments, which would, first, require some claimants to work longer before qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits; secondly, reduce the current rate of benefits; thirdly, require high income recipients to repay a portion of unemployment insurance benefits received; and, fourthly, provide a new financing formula for the labour force extended phase.

In the original proposal on repeating claimants it had been contemplated that if an individual drew 26 weeks of benefits, he or she would have to work that same number of weeks in order to establish a new claim. However, after hearing representations from many sources, especially those in the Atlantic provinces, the government has made two significant changes to the definition of "repeaters," so that this provision will now create less hardship in those regions of Canada with high unemployment, and where jobs are harder to find. Moreover, to take account of important regional disparities, the bill now proposes that the "repeaters" provision will not apply in any region of Canada where the applicable regional unemployment rate is over 11.5 per cent.

Another change proposed by Bill C-14 is the reduction in the weekly unemployment insurance benefit rate from 66½ per cent of the average insurable earnings to 60 per cent. When these amendments are fully implemented there will be a saving to employers and to employees, and therefore there will be no increase in the unemployment insurance premiums. The unemployment insurance premiums will actually be reduced in 1979.

The committee was informed that several of the provinces felt that their welfare costs would be increased, but we were advised that even if there were no employment strategy, additional welfare costs in 1979-80 are not estimated to exceed $51 million, of which 50 per cent would be paid by the federal government. In other words, costs to the provinces would be approximately $25 million in 1979-80 and $43 million in 1980-81.

Honourable senators, one particular group which feels it is a target of government expenditure reductions is the women. This group was ably represented on our committee by Senators Inman, Norrie, Anderson and Bird, who are strong supporters of women's rights. Some of the changes may well affect women, but they also affect men. While it is true that the establishment of a 20-hour minimum for insurability may have a larger proportional impact on women, there are other amendments, such as the high entrance requirements for repeaters, and the higher income benefit repayment, which have a much stronger effect on men. For example, for all of the provisions taken together the reduction in benefits for women is 20.1 per cent, while the reduction in benefits for men is 19.8 per cent. In terms of absolute numbers, more men than women will be affected.

On the evidence, Canadians appear to want the unemployment insurance program tightened. The committee believes that this bill is a positive, balanced step in that direction, and one which Canadians will approve, as should the Senate. The committee, therefore, approves the bill in principle.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Bird: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

As Senator Bonnell has told you, the members of the committee really did their homework, and there was an awful lot of homework to do. We subjected the witnesses to long questioning on every aspect of Bill C-14, and I think we received all the information we could possibly need to speak with authority on the proposed amendments.

I shall begin by saying that I am in sympathy with the government's concern over the growing cost of unemployment insurance that arises from the fact that so many people are out of work. I realize that the government is confident it can provide more jobs and increase the nation's productivity with the $900 million saved by reducing the benefit rate, by increasing the entrance requirements, and by increasing the minimum weekly insurability. I well understand also its desire to provide inducements so that workers may become more securely attached to the work force, and I agree that every effort should be made to prevent people from misusing the unemployment insurance program. These are laudable principles, honourable senators, with which I am sure we will all agree.

Unfortunately, I cannot support the methods proposed in the bill of implementing these principles. I think the bill shows a serious lack of political understanding and judgment, and, what is much more important, I think it is unjust. I am convinced that the bill will cause unnecessary suffering in many households. It will militate against all those workers who, through no fault of their own, are unable to find employment. It will do so by cutting benefits by 10 per cent at a time when the cost of living is rising at the rate of 9 per cent a year.

It will do great harm to part-time workers by increasing the minimum weekly insurability to 20 hours. The average part-time worker puts in a 16-hour week. The increase to 20 hours is going to make it particularly hard for women, as Senator Bonnell pointed out. Twenty-two per cent of all women who work are part-time workers, and 71 per cent of all part-time workers are women.

I remind the house that women work because they need the money. They work part time, very often, because of family obligations. Many of them are sole support mothers, and they have to be with their children for part of the day. Very often they work part time because of poor health, because they are too old to work full time, or because they cannot get full-time work. Many of them are poor.

Furthermore, the increase in the entrance requirement to 20 weeks will also cause hardship to many women—as it will, of course, to many men. I am particularly worried about what it will do to women, since so many of them are engaged in service industries, or are seasonally employed. Many of them just cannot get work for as long as five months, and so they need these benefits to keep them off public assistance.

The Advisory Council on the Status of Women, which is a most intelligent group of people appointed by the government, was not consulted with respect to this bill, but they presented a strong brief which I hope all honourable senators will read. It is attached to the committee's report. The National Action Committee of Women, which represents about 40 women's organizations, was equally strong in its presentation.

Honourable senators, I could talk about this bill for a long time, but I think I have made it clear why, in conscience, I shall not be able to vote for it.

On motion of Senator Thompson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

J.H. POITRAS & SON LTD.—COMMONS MESSAGE

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-34 to amend the Criminal Code.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Royce Frith moved that the bill be now read a second time.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is a technical amendment to correct an oversight in the firearms acquisition certificate system.

I propose to explain the bill under three headings: First, the subject matter of section 95, the section being amended by the bill before you today; second, the problems addressed by the amendment; and third, the solution proposed by the amendment, and why it is very desirable that the bill be passed in order to make it effective before January 1.

Section 95 deals with the firearms acquisition certificate system. For background, I can tell you that that section had first reading in the other place on April 20, 1977, and was passed there on July 18, 1977. It had first reading in this chamber on August 1, 1977, was passed on August 4, 1977, and had royal assent on August 5 of that year. That is its legislative history. Its context, as I have mentioned, is that firearms control includes the firearms acquisition certificate system. That deals with my first heading, the subject matter of the present section and its legislative history.

Now, the problem addressed by the amendment. When Parliament passed the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1977, it intended that the acquisition of guns would be controlled by the firearms acquisition certificate system. Parliament clearly intended that people should not need certificates in order to keep the guns they already own, but only when they undertake to acquire a gun.

Paragraph 95(2)(b) of the Criminal Code—the one we are dealing with—exempts an individual from the requirement to produce a certificate when his gun is being returned to him by an individual to whom it has been lent. However, the present law does not specifically exempt an individual from the requirement to produce a certificate when his gun is being returned to him by a licensed dealer who has taken the gun into his possession for the purpose of repairing or storing it. Amendment of the legislation is desired before January 1, 1979—the effective date of the original legislation—to provide for such an exemption.

Part of the problem, honourable senators, is that provinces have adopted different interpretations of the law, with the result that some jurisdictions will enforce the law with reference to the certificate, and others will not.

There is a certain amount of anxiety because, even in jurisdictions where the law may not be enforced, businesses will be concerned that they may either be prosecuted or lose their business permits. Remington, for example, is currently recalling more than 2,000 guns for repair across the country. In view of the inconsistent application of the law, Remington will probably insist that individuals produce a certificate before their guns are returned.

There are, of course, in addition, as always with this subject, some safety considerations. Some individuals, particularly in the case of the Remington recall, may not bother to have their guns repaired if they must produce a certificate to get them back. That could undermine their safety and that of others, which is entirely in conflict with the intent of gun control.

There is, with reference to my second branch—namely, problems addressed by the amendment—another technical amendment that deals with the French version.

Honourable senators, the bill before you does not help you without the other section, so let me explain that subclause 1(2) of Bill C-34 provides that paragraph 95(4)(a) of the French version is repealed, and another paragraph substituted for it. Let me explain why that is done.

The English version of section 95(4) says:

—acquires a firearm in circumstances such that, by virtue of . . . does not apply to the person from whom he acquires the firearm—

Whereas the present French version says:

—à l'emprunteur d'une arme à feu dans le cas où, vu le paragraphe (2) . . . n'est pas applicable à l'emprunteur—

So it uses the words "borrower and lender" rather than the words used of "acquires a firearm."

Then, if you look at the bill now before us you will see that the French version has been changed to read:

—à celui qui obtient la possession d'une arme à feu dans les cas où, vu le paragraphe (2), le paragraphe (1) n'est pas applicable à la personne qui la lui prête ou la lui rend—

That is a technical or linguistic amendment to bring the two sections into concordance, and also to fit the main amendment.

So the solution proposed is in clause 1 of the bill, and it will be seen that a paragraph is added to cover the problem I have described. It reads:

● (1410)

(c) who comes into possession of a firearm in the ordinary course of a business described in subsection 103(1) and who returns that firearm to the person from whom he received it.

Subsection 103(1), for your information, deals with records of transactions for firearms in the ordinary course of business.

As I said, it is a technical amendment to correct an oversight in the firearms acquisition certificate system. Unfortunately, the legislation did not provide for a specific exemption from presenting a certificate for owners picking up their firearms from gunsmiths after repairs.

In closing, honourable senators, I should say that this amendment has the full support of all the provinces. They are just as concerned that the failure to pass such an amendment at this time could lead to inconsistent enforcement across Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have had the advantage of reading the Debates of the other place on this subject, and of listening just now to the convincing remarks of the sponsor of the bill in the Senate. It is important that there be uniform enforcement of the law in all provinces with respect to a federal statute, and when questions of interpretation arise, as is the case in this instance, it is important to put the matter straight as quickly as possible and not inconvenience the public by passing faulty legislation that goes on the statute books.

Honourable senators, I certainly have no objection to having this bill pass through the various stages as quickly as possible.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of October 1978, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

Report of the National Arts Centre Corporation, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, pursuant to section 17 of the National Arts Centre Act, Chapter N-2, R.S.C., 1970.

BELL CANADA

DISCONNECTION OF TELEPHONE SERVICE

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order related to a question I asked of the Leader of the Government on Bell Canada's practice of cutting off service to those subscribers who leave the telephone off the hook. I read in this morning's press that Bell Canada has now had a change of heart, and will discontinue the practice.

I am left wondering whether that change of heart is the result of representations made by the Leader of the Government. In any event, I compliment him on the speed with which he was able to provide me with an answer by way of action.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we all like to think that questions asked by honourable senators in the house and the responses thereto by the government constitute, at times, very helpful initiatives in advancing the interests of the Canadian people.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REMOVAL OF SUBSIDY TO MILLERS OF WHEAT—QUESTION

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government in relation to the removal of the subsidy to millers of wheat. On December 6 last I asked the Leader of the Government to make inquiries as to what might be the result of the withdrawal of the subsidy to millers of wheat in terms of the cost of a loaf of bread to the ultimate consumer.

Notwithstanding the reply given on December 6, I see now that a price agreement has been reached at the retail level involving perhaps a 7-cent per loaf increase in bread prices. That does not seem to conform with what would be the normal mathematical computation stemming from the loss of the subsidy.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have attempted on two occasions to provide at least a partial reply to the question. I refer to the Debates of the Senate of December 6, page 320, where I am reported as saying:

It is estimated by officials in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that a fair increase in the price of a loaf of bread would range from 5 to 7 cents. There have been reports of increases which would range as high as 12 cents a loaf. The government has no control over the mark-ups charged by certain bakeries across the country.

And then I went on with other remarks.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been reported in the press recently as saying that the government's estimate of a fair increase would be still in the range of 5 to 7 cents. I understand, however, that some bakeries are taking the position that they were at the very point of increasing bread prices in any case, with the result that they are adding that anticipated increase to the extra cost resulting from the withdrawal of the subsidy.

● (1420)

Senator Benidickson: That is not understood by the consumer.

Senator Perrault: I agree that that explanation may not be understood by the consumers of Canada; indeed, it is not comprehended by all of us in the government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES RESERVES—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question to put to the Leader of the Government, and I hope that he will be able to deal with it as quickly as he dealt with my question with respect to Bell Canada. It has to do with a very important segment of our society, the Canadian Armed Forces Reserves. I wonder if he would try to determine the reaction of the Minister of National Defence to the suggestion by the Major General of Reserves that industry might be offered tax incentives to allow members of the Canadian Armed Forces Reserves to leave their regular jobs without fear of penalty in time of national emergency or for summer camp training.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a reply will be sought from the Minister of National Defence. The idea appears to be a constructive one, and I know the minister always welcomes constructive suggestions.

Senator Marshall: If I may elaborate by way of supplementary, in view of the fact that the state of the Reserves as to readiness capability has been deteriorating steadily because of lack of training equipment, and the turnover is to the point where only 30 per cent of the force of 22,000 could be counted on to react to an emergency, would he also ask the Minister of National Defence to report on the status of the Reserves, his plans and the overall short-and long-term objectives of the Canadian Armed Forces?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. However, again it suggests the possible value at some point in the next few months of having a debate on the subject of defence policy. This might represent a real contribution to this nation, and honourable senators may wish to consider that idea.

FISHERIES

PURCHASE PROGRAM FOR CANNED MACKEREL—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 10—By Senator Marshall:

[Senator Perrault.]

With reference to Fisheries and Environment Canada News Release FMS-HQ-NR-23, dated 29 June 1978, what are the details of the $2 million purchase program for canned mackerel.

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

Following the press announcement on canned mackerel, processors from the following provinces requested and were offered quotas to produce for the Fisheries Prices Support Board 107,000 cases (24-14 oz) of canned mackerel for a total expenditure of $1,230,500.00.

	Cases	Value
Quebec	30,000	345,000
New Brunswick	53,000	609,500
Prince Edward Island	24,000	276,000

On November 30, 1978, these canned mackerel producers had delivered 55,660 cases of canned mackerel to the board valued at $640,090.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RESULTS OF D.V.A. MANAGEMENT MEETINGS AND CONFERENCE ON FINANCE—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 14—By Senator Marshall:

1. What are the results of the D.V.A. management meetings held in Quebec City on March 21, 1978?

2. What are the results of the D.V.A. management meetings held in Winnipeg on May 25, 1978?

3. What are the results of the D.V.A. Conference on Finance held at the Federal Government Study Centre in Arnprior, Ontario?

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

1 and 2. Headquarters and field offices senior management, through discussions and exchange of information on matters of mutual interest and concern regarding Veterans Affairs and the federal government in general, gained a better understanding of the factors involved in the implementation of administrative decisions already taken or to be taken in the future.

3. The results were:

an evaluation of the recent reports of the Auditor General and Comptroller General on financial management in departments;

revised financial and accounting procedures to respond to internal reorganization and the physical relocation of the Department;

new emphasis on a program for the training and development of financial staff.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on the subject matter of Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Hon. Andrew Thompson: Honourable senators, Senator Bonnell has outlined the principles which underline the bill, and I would like to reiterate those because I think it important that they be kept in focus as we give it consideration.

The objective of the bill is to provide incentives so that workers may become more securely attached to the work force, and to that end the government is attempting to reduce some of the disincentives to work which are at present in the unemployment insurance program. Also to that end, the government has formulated a variety of approaches to provide more work for those who would otherwise be on unemployment insurance.

The employment strategy in 1979-80 will have an impact of some $710 million creating an estimated 113,000 work years and training for some 360,000 people. A further $300 million in funds for economic development activities has been announced, and the government's new target, as Senator Bonnell pointed out, for jobs and training in 1979-80 represents a 70 per cent increase over what has been and is being accomplished in the current year. By any standards, that is a significant increase.

On the job creation front, the government could not rest content solely with the strategy outlined for 1978-79, substantial as that would be, but instead announced the immediate start-up of a job experience training program called JET, involving some $75 million, which should result in about 58,500 young Canadians being employed in meaningful work by the winter. The government has also made changes to the employment tax credit program so that it will better fit the needs of the business community.

The growing cost of the unemployment insurance program—about $4.1 billion in this fiscal year—just cannot be ignored by any responsible Canadian. Nor could the government ignore the employment disincentive effects which were adding to other problems in the labour market. I am sure that every honourable senator in this chamber would agree that that serious problem must be dealt with.

Bill C-14 provides for major unemployment insurance amendments, and I should like to recite them because they are important to us. The first is to require some claimants to work longer before qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits. The second is to reduce the current rate of benefits. The third is to require high income recipients to repay a portion of unemployment insurance benefits received. The fourth is to provide a new financing formula for the labour force extended phase.

The problem must be clear to every senator but, if I may, I will just adopt the words of one of the witnesses who appeared before us when we were studying the bill. He said that the enormous cost burden of unemployment insurance, being some $4.1 billion for the program, plus the disincentive characteristics, which unfortunately are in the existing program and result in the loss of productive work, just cannot be tolerated, just cannot be afforded by Canadians today with our high deficit financing.

Let me break down that $4.1 billion. It is made up, partly, from the contributions of all taxpayers, but it is also made up—and I am sure all honourable senators realize this—from the contributions of employers and the vast numbers of employees who diligently and conscientiously work regularly at jobs across Canada. Of the $4.1 billion, the government, through the taxpayers of this country, pay $1.8 billion, and the employers and employees pay $2.3 billion. One witness told us in committee that without the disincentives contained in this bill there could be an increasing resentment by employed workers who are carrying the load towards the outflow of this enormous amount of $2.3 billion for benefits to Canadians, many of whom are not able to obtain work.

What are the savings in the proposed new amendments? Perhaps I could break that down as it applies to each amendment. The first is that hourly paid and salaried workers will have to work a minimum of 20 hours a week to be insurable. That will mean a saving of $60 million. The second amendment is that there will be a higher entrance requirement of up to 20 weeks for people just entering or re-entering the labour force. This will mean a saving of $300 million. There will also be a higher entrance requirement for repeating claimants, effecting a saving of $140 million.

The benefit rate will be reduced to 60 per cent of the average weekly insurable earnings from 66%, which will save $470 million. The financing formula will be changed so that the cost of labour force extended benefits will be shared by the public and private sectors, and will mean a saving of $400 million. A benefit repayment of 30 per cent will be imposed on part of the UI benefits received by people whose annual net income, including UI benefits, exceeds 1.5 per cent of the yearly maximum insurable earnings. It means that roughly $20,000 a year will be involved in paying back that 30 per cent, and the saving will be something like $25 million.

In looking at these amendments, we should realize that their effect will apply all across this country, and I consider it important not only that the government makes decisions but that it shows the process of making those decisions. In some ways the process of making decisions is just as important, in a democracy, as arriving at a decision. I frankly regret that there has not been much consultation, in the presentation of these amendments, with key organizations across Canada that are likely to be affected. I refer primarily to national employer groups, as well as the Canadian Labour Congress, prominent women's groups, and other organizations. Too often the government has proposed legislation without consultation with those who may be affected. Perhaps it is because of the pressure brought to bear on the government in connection with the $50 million that will be saved each month if these amendments come into force in the New Year, that the legislation had to be rushed through without adequate consultation. So far as I am concerned, it is a practice that should be stopped.

Provincial welfare ministers appeared before the committee in the other place to express their views and to offer suggestions as a result of their not having been consulted prior to the proposed legislation. That is one of the first areas of criticism that I had in mind in connection with this. I would like to re-emphasize that the process of decision-making is as important as the actual decision itself.

Having stated, as I have, the enormous financial burden that this unemployment insurance program, as it presently exists, places on the Canadian people, let me turn to certain concerns that I have about the program, and that I felt other members of the committee also had.

This act is called the Unemployment Insurance Act, and I stress the word "insurance." From this point of view, it seems to me that this statute has been stretched so far that at times the principle of insurance has been lost, and is in danger of being replaced by a welfare approach. I think, as Senator Roblin and others have said, that one of the concerns we should have is to make sure that legislation has a purpose that is crystal clear, so that it cannot be distorted and allowed to spill over into other areas. I am thinking, for instance, of the family allowances legislation, and the approaches taken in that regard.

The distortion I refer to in the case of unemployment insurance may go back to a period some years ago when, perhaps born of a sense of humanity and generosity, the decision was taken to include seasonal workers in the scheme. I refer particularly to fishermen, the inclusion of whom under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act was promoted by a colleague of Senator Cook's. At that point a distortion was already taking place in the unemployment insurance concept. Certainly, as far as I am concerned, the insurance principle was distorted by the 1971 amendments.

One of the dangers that arises in this sort of distortion is that contributors become confused. It tends to make them stop thinking that they are dealing with an insurance program, and causes them to begin to feel that they are paying into the scheme and have a right in any circumstances to get back some of what they have contributed. As Senator Lang pointed out in our discussions, it is fairly clear that in the case of workmen's compensation in Ontario compensation is only received by a contributor when he suffers an accident, because it is a program that was specifically set up to protect workers against such unfortunate circumstances. In the case of unemployment insurance, however, my impression is that there are some who consider unemployment to be something that takes place with the seasons, or as a result of a mood, and that, in any event, the payments are something they have the right to apply for. This kind of thinking may not be universally prevalent, but I think all of us would agree that it does exist in Canada.

Almost every industrial nation has a social insurance system for the unemployed, and, of course, one of the dangers, as we discovered as we listened to the witnesses who appeared before the committee, is that there is a tendency to say, "Well, let us compare our unemployment insurance program with such programs in other nations." Of course, this is a very difficult, if not impossible, task. We cannot make a comparison with the Swedish system, for example, with the many built-in security features it has; and we cannot make a comparison with the United States system, because, on closer examination, we find that their program is administered by the individual state, with the result that the southern states, such as Alabama, may not have the same benefits as Ohio and New York. If you look at the average situation in the United States, our benefits may appear more generous. Yet I am given to understand by the officials that, if a comparison is made, our benefits are as competitive for us; that is, they are equal to those of Ohio and New York.

Some of the arguments for a national unemployment insurance act are that with mobility, the necessity to be alert to the requirements for workers, the transfer of workers, their training and so on, you must have this national perspective. I accept that. However, I wonder if the administration of unemployment insurance must be based on a national program. As I say the United States run their programs on an individual state basis.

I feel that the uniformity of our national programs makes them blunt and crude instruments, when one thinks in terms of the regional disparities across our nation. The longer I consider this program, the more apparent it becomes that it is difficult to adopt this uniform approach.

We keep adding to the role of this act. Job creation is now encompassed in this act as well as Canada assistance programs, LEDA, CESI, tax incentive programs, and so on. This creates a situation where, for example, we have to ask the manager of a local office—an administrator who knows the details and who, I hope, is a humanitarian—to be an entrepreneur, in that he should be looking for community development opportunities so that he can create job opportunities in his community. I think that is going a little too far.

We have to take a hard, fundamental look, not only at this program but at all our programs. We must start looking at matters involving social security legislation, including unemployment insurance. We have to bear in mind the fundamental changes in our society. I am sure that all senators have read Future Shock and are aware of the changes taking place in all industrial society today. We should consider whether we have moulded thinking and legislation which we can extend to meet the changes obviously taking place with respect to style of living, mobility, and the pattern of changing employment in a lifetime. As I understand it, three or four changes of employment take place in the average Canadian's lifetime.

We must also take into consideration the distribution of wealth. Senator Lamontagne pointed out to me that there was a saying in the past with respect to the distribution of wealth, that there were the Masseys and there were the masses. In other words, there was a clear distinction in Canada between the very wealthy and the rest of us. However, today I feel that the distribution of wealth is different—there is a much larger middle-class group—and I think we should bear that in mind when considering programs such as this. I feel that the legislation that has come before us this year is patchwork social legislation rather than legislation containing fundamental changes. Having done such sterling work as chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy, Senator Lamontagne may feel that is another area in which he should become involved.

Perhaps I am emphasizing this too much, but I feel that this legislation is like a coat I may have provided for my daughter when she was three years old, which, now that she is six, I am trying to patch to fit her. In some places it bulges a bit because of the development of her anatomy, and in other places it leaves some holes. I feel there are some real gaps in this legislation.

As Senator Bird mentioned, some of the gaps are created because we are not being sensitive enough to the needs of women moving into the work force. I look over at my colleague, Senator Marshall, and am reminded that the needs of Newfoundland and the other Atlantic provinces are certainly different from those of the industrial heart of Ontario where I come from.

In examining the subject matter of this bill, we considered the means by which the different needs of the various regions of Canada are determined. In an attempt to provide a more sensitive Unemployment Insurance Act, our country has been divided into 48 regions, based on Statistics Canada figures. Statistics Canada provides the rate of unemployment in each of those 48 regions, on a monthly basis. This creates its own set of problems. For example, Statistics Canada had assessed the unemployment rate in Churchill at 4 per cent. The member for Churchill suggested that, indeed, it was much higher than that because Indians were not included in that figure. Statistics Canada admitted that it was too difficult to go on to the reserves and do a proper analysis. Consequently, a new approach will be taken, as proposed in one of the amendments. The member for Churchill felt that the figure should have been far more than the stated 4 per cent.

Before the extent of unemployment is determined, a hard look should be taken at these 48 regions. A region may include a thriving city and a hinterland where there is a lack of job opportunities, and that could produce a distorted picture of the actual job opportunities within the region as a whole. Dividing the country into 48 regions could cause a disincentive towards mobility. It may be better to go back to a region of high unemployment, where the benefits are perhaps more generous, rather than taking the chances of moving into a region where benefits are not generous. I do not know the effect of that, but I do know one of the questions we asked was: What is the flow of people across Canada today? The deputy minister mentioned to us that it is a flow moving back east rather than going west.

Perhaps we would be better able than the other house to make a long, hard, fundamental study of just what is taking place in Canada. Is it because of economic hard times that people tend to want to go home and have the security and familiarity of home? I don't know what it is.

There are a number of programs, which we discussed in depth, and perhaps I could refer to some of them. First, the Canada Works Program provides job opportunities through the help and assistance of the federal government in these areas. Senator Bird was sensitive to this. In fact, I may say she well represented the interests of women and the concerns of women across Canada about these changes. As I understand it, in the Canada Works Program, only 29 per cent of women are employed in these projects. It would be interesting to know how many women have opportunities for employment in the other proposed projects.

I have referred, as did Senator Bonnell, to the JET program, with $45 million being put into it, and 58,000 young Canadians will soon be working in that.

The work-sharing program is one of which some of the witnesses were very critical. Under this program, if it looks as though a plant cannot employ its full complement of employees, provided there is consent by the union and the management, the government will move in and a proportion of workers will work a proportion of the time so that they can share in the work.

There are 20 pilot projects across Canada, because they are trying to see how this will work before they embark on it on a larger scale. Although one of our witnesses was highly critical of government moving into this, I understand that in Germany it has been effective and they are using it fairly extensively, as I think they are in France. I understand, merely from my reading, that in Britain they had divided the workload during the week in order to give every man the opportunity of working, but it has been suggested that a tendency developed whereby people did not feel like going back to a full work week after having had a short working week for a period. Apparently in the other two countries it has worked successfully.

I was certainly impressed with the civil servants who are running this department, with their dedication, knowledge and grasp, and also the imagination they are applying. The departmental witnesses who came before us were highly impressive. I think all the committee agreed with that.

With respect to the work programs, such as LEDA and others, the department is monitoring OECD, the ILO and anywhere else they can for ideas, for new approaches they can take, so that new opportunities can be provided. Also, within the department they are trying not to be rigid and bureaucratic over ideas that may come from areas such as Senator Marshall's province. In other words, they know that it does not quite fit the approach we have organized, but they are trying to make it open-ended and flexible to fit the local area's needs.

I turn next to training. I want to address myself to some of the complexity and perhaps, some of the dilemma of the minister, whom I consider a most humanitarian person, who has to make hard, tough decisions right now. I think that most responsible Canadians will certainly be behind him in making these tough decisions.

In training people and providing job opportunities there are problems. If young people are trained, they want to get work after they are trained. Therefore the question is whether you put the training program in an area where there are no occupations that will offer them job opportunities. The minister made the point that he felt that certain specific job training should be carried out where there are employment opportunities. Having said that, he recognizes that in a province such as Newfoundland there will not be as many job opportunities after training as there would be in, for example, Ontario, if I might refer to my own province again.

Senator Marshall will know that the cuts for his province have resulted in $85 million being taken out of the economy. On the other hand, in job creation programs for Newfoundland, $300 million has been put back. In fact, as an Ontario resident I look at Newfoundland and see that the per capita sharing of occupational training is three times higher than that in Ontario. In some ways this comes back to the dilemma that we have across our country with respect to a national program that they are trying to distribute across the country. I myself agree with the approach of the minister, whereby the training priority is given to occupations in areas where employment is relatively strong. Yet I also understand that he has to think of every province.

For the most part, the programs they are trying to emphasize in areas where there is not a large industrial complex are areas where they are working with the local departments of forestry, and so on. I do not want to go into a lot of detail, but it was illustrated to us that in two of the maritime provinces negotiations have been concluded with the departments of forestry in order to provide jobs.

Senator Roblin will be much more aware than I am of the problem we discussed of training in technical and vocational schools. In the 1960s there was a great boom, largely at the inspiration of the federal government, when it was said that we needed to build these technical and vocational schools across the country.

As you all know, institutional and industrial training is carried out with the co-operation of the provinces. Where you have a large plant you hate to see it not used. Where you have certain kinds of courses, with all the necessary equipment, you hate to disband them because there are already enough tradespeople in the particular area.

I am sure that many senators have looked at the Auditor General's report. He suggested that the federal government must get tougher in its negotiations concerning training programs. I was interested not only in the training programs but also in the number of graduates of training programs who actually get work. The purpose of taking this training is to enable one to get a job. The deputy minister told me that about 70 per cent of the graduates from these training courses actually get work. In my own province, Ontario, for example, 62 per cent of the graduates of occupational skill courses subsequently obtain employment, and five per cent take further training. Fifty per cent of those taking the language training course are employed, and six per cent are taking further training. Twenty-seven per cent of those who took basic training for skill development were employed, and 31 per cent are taking further training.

It may be important to take a hard look at this to ensure that the selection of people for these training courses is examined more thoroughly, and to ensure that the training is relevant to the needs of the job market.

I am looking at this in the longer term, and apart from the provisions of this bill. To me, the bill does not really answer the fundamental changes taking place in our society. The Senate should be looking to the jobs and skills that will be needed in Canada in the year 2000, as well as the pattern of work in farming and other industries. We should be looking at the approach we need to take in respect of the training of young people.

Obviously, in the sixties, in establishing a large number of vocational and technical schools, we overbuilt and were not aware of what the situation would be in the future.

Senator Roblin: Only in some places.

Senator Thompson: I do not refer to the honourable senator's province, but to my own. I feel that that did happen there.

We have to think in terms of the need aspect, as well as the insurance aspect. I think there was the suggestion made by the provinces that there should be a two-tier system. The young, single person has mobility. He does not need the same benefits as the person with dependants. The provinces were suggesting that the benefit for the young, single person should be cut by 50 per cent, while for the person with dependants it should stay at 66⅔ per cent. It was suggested this would be better than the system in which claimants, whether they have dependants or not, get the same benefit.

This was the approach taken in the period between 1970 and 1975. This act has been revamped, changed and brought back again. Between 1970 and 1975 there was a dependency clarification. The argument now raised is that it is hard to define "dependant." It is not the insurance principle. If the benefit for young, single persons were cut by 50 per cent it would adversely affect more women than men because there are more single women than single men.

I find myself favouring the two-tier system because the family of the man in Cape Breton, for example, will receive a smaller family allowance because we in the Senate passed a bill that reduces the family allowance by $6 to $20. If the family allowance had been indexed, it would have gone to $28. He is also going to be hit by the cut in benefits. His belt is tight right now, but it is going to be tightened more, if that is possible, as of January 1, 1979. I think there should have been a much closer look at the effect on the person in the work force with dependants.

The other group that could have been examined are the voluntary quitters. These are people who quit work without just cause. Last year, 220,000 people in the work force quit of their own accord. I am not suggesting that people cannot quit their jobs. They can, because we live in a free country, but it seems to me that we should be looking at that group. Those who voluntarily quit work and do not seek other employment, but who have a choice of other employment, are the ones we should be focusing on. I am more sympathetic with the fellow who has lost his job through no fault of his own.

I have great respect for Senator Bird, and I appreciate her expressions of concern with respect to women, but I suggest that the adverse effects of these cuts on women are not as disproportionate as she would have us believe. I have some figures that indicate the reduction of benefits will affect 19.8 per cent of the male work force and 20.1 per cent of the female work force. The "repeaters" provisions will affect 3.4 per cent of the men and 2.3 per cent of the women; and the re-entry provisions will affect 6.4 per cent of the men and 6.4 per cent of the women. The weekly insurable minimum will affect 0.7 per cent of the men and 2.4 per cent of the women. The reason is that there are more women on the minimum wage than men. The benefits repayment provisions, which apply to those who earn $20,000 or more per annum, affect 0.7 per cent of the men and 0.2 per cent of the women. Again, women, on the whole, do not earn as much as men.

Senator Bird mentioned the requirement of 20 hours of work per week and felt it would hurt women more because, as she said, 22 per cent of all women who work are part-time workers, and 71 per cent of all part-time workers are women.

I worked less than 20 hours a week when I was going to school and to university. I would never have thought that I could have obtained unemployment insurance benefits to carry me while I was not working. I do not know how many people there are who work less than 20 hours a week and are not in difficult circumstances. On the other hand, I am aware of and am very sympathetic to, the needs of women. Having said that, and sounding as though I hear of abuses everywhere, I would say that there have been abuses.

The Auditor General, pointed out that for example, he had uncovered $140 million in overpayments, although some of these overpayments may not have been the fault of the claimants. The department found $62.8 million. The Auditor General suggested that there be more stringent controls, and we are assured that this suggestion has since been adopted. There is an advertising campaign underway warning people against keeping overpayments; there are more efficient computers; and local and national offices are becoming more consistent in their approach.

The re-amalgamation of the Manpower offices and the Unemployment Insurance offices should help in this regard. You will recall that formerly Manpower offices and Unemployment Insurance offices were combined. It has now been decided that they are more effective operating as a unit: a counsellor telling someone to seek a job can refer that individual to the Manpower offices in the next room.

I feel that the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science has studied this bill thoroughly. I have certainly learned a great deal about unemployment insurance as a result of being a member of that committee and I have sympathy and admiration for the officials of the department. They are trying to apply their administration across the country in a humane, fair and just way. I also have sympathy for the minister. He has the responsibility of getting tougher. However, I am in this dilemma. As a Canadian, I see the need for us to be more competitive and more productive in world markets, and for us to get our finances on an even keel. On the other hand, I look at this huge cost of $4.2 billion a year which will rise unless something is done about it. I have been assured by the departmental officials that they are sympathetic, towards claimants, but they also have to be realistic. It is for that reason that I am in agreement with, and will support, the proposition presented by Senator Bonnell.

Senator Bosa: I wonder whether the honourable senator would permit a question. You intimated that the government did not consult affected groups, such as associations, corporations, unions and governments. It is my understanding that the provinces did make representations to the committee of the other place after second reading. Did the honourable senator mean that the consultation should have taken place prior to the drafting of the bill?

Senator Thompson: Yes, I did. I was disappointed also because there was no advisory council to advise the minister. I understand that he had problems with the Canadian Labour Congress on this—and Senator Forsey can correct me if I am wrong—because that is the body that was asked to nominate members for that council. It is still being discussed. The minister also told us that he had been trying to find someone who would be acceptable both to management and labour. He indicated that after a long search he had finally arrived at his decision, and apologized for the delay.

I feel that there is a great need to have prior consultation, rather than making it necessary for the provinces to come to Ottawa to appear before a committee of the other place. I have never heard of provincial ministers appearing before a committee of the other place. Usually the provincial ministers consult with their peer minister in Ottawa.

Senator Bosa: You indicated that it would have been desirable to have a two-tier system: one for single people with no dependants, who should be entitled to receive 50 per cent of the benefits; and the other for unemployed persons with dependants, who should receive 60 per cent of the benefits.

Senator Thompson: It is 66⅔ per cent. That is the position of the provinces.

Senator Bosa: I am sorry for missing out on a few percentage points. What is the real purpose behind the two-tier system? Is it to save the federal government money, or is it to provide higher mobility to single people who might be in a position to go from one place to another in search of a job?

Senator Thompson: I think it covers the two points you have just made: it provides a mobility incentive to the single person; and I think it does save the government money—at least, according to the submission from the provinces.

Senator Bosa: How much?

Senator Thompson: I think the approximate figure is $44 million.

A third point is that I think it should be obvious to all that the financial needs of a worker with dependants are greater than those of a single person. The unemployment insurance package, from 1970 to 1975, took that factor into consideration. Perhaps a married person with dependants would have to pay higher premiums to obtain greater benefits, but I think it should be considered again.

Senator Roblin: If no other senator wishes to speak at this time, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

● (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, that this debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion, please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.
And more than two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Motion of Senator Roblin negatived on the following division:

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion defeated.

● (1530)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, as the ranks of Tuscan have prevailed, I suppose it is incumbent upon me to make a few remarks in connection with this motion, which I am pleased to do. Not that it will take me long, nor is it my intention to deal with the main subject of Bill C-14 at this particular stage, but I want to share with the house my concern about the nature of the resolution which is now before us.

However, before I do that, I want to express my thanks to Senator Bonnell who kindly presented me with Issues Nos. 6 and 7 of the proceedings of the committee, as he said he would, so I now wish to report that they have been received, if not read.

What bothers me, honourable senators, has to do with the nature of this particular proceeding, because in the resolution of November 29, by which the committee was set up, the motion was that the committee:

—be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of the Bill C-14, intituled: "An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

I am aware that it is the custom in this house to take advantage of the opportunity to study matters which we know we will be faced with in due course but which have not yet officially come to our notice. So it has been the custom to take the subject matter of a bill which is proceeding through the various stages in the other place and have a look at it before it comes here, in order to make perhaps the best use of our time. That is a particularly defensible idea, I think, in connection with complicated bills such as those the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is accustomed to consider. So I am at ease with that particular way of doing business.

What bothers me, however, is that the resolution we have before us now, that the chairman of the committee has submitted to the house, says—I quote the last lines of the resolution, and I hope I give the flavour of the point I want to make—that the committee:

—has, in obedience to the order of reference, examined the said subject matter and now reports that it approves of the principle of the bill.

Well, if you want to be technical—and I think it is imperative sometimes to recognize that technicalities can be important—the committee was not seized of the bill. The bill is not before this chamber. It is the subject matter of the bill that the committee was seized of, and I presume they could make any report they like on the subject matter. But we are being asked "to consider"; I am not sure whether that means "to approve".

The resolution says "consider"; I presume it does not mean "approve".

In that consideration I want to make the point that the wording of the resolution, "that it approves of the principle of the bill", seems to me to be questionable. The reason I quibble, you might say, over the difference between the subject matter of the bill and the principle of the bill is simply because the time at which legislative bodies usually consider matters of principle in connection with a piece of legislation is the second reading stage of the bill. That is the time: after it has been introduced. We have second reading and we are restricted, as a rule, in the debate on second reading to considering the principle of the bill. Although we have views pro and con, we have to make up our minds whether, on balance, we are in favour of the principle or whether, on balance, we are or not. It seems to me that if we engage in the consideration of the principle before that stage, as we are being invited to do now, on the report of the committee, we may involve ourselves in difficulties, because there is another rule of the house that says we do not consider twice matters which are substantially the same.

So what position are we in today? We have heard some good speeches, I suggest. I liked the speech I heard from Senator Thompson; I liked the speech I heard from Senator Bird. I appreciated as well the introduction made by the chairman of the committee. But they, in effect, were debating the bill. That is the point I want to make.

It seems to me that we would be wiser if we set up committees of this sort to make sure that, when the reports come back to the house, they either come back after the bill itself has officially been received and resubmitted to the committee and discussed, in which case no problem arises; or, if they come back to the house before the bill has been officially received, it is made quite clear that we are not pre-empting any of those activities that occur in connection with the second reading of bills. Otherwise, I could make my one speech on this resolution, for instance, and say everything I have to say on the bill, and then I could make it again later, on second reading, but it seems to me that that would be a silly thing to do.

On the question of whether or not we are engaged in examining twice the principle of the same matter in the same session, I must say that that does not commend itself to me. I want to make the point that we should be more careful in the reports of our committees to make sure we do not get into this particular dilemma, if it is a dilemma. I think it is partly a dilemma. For that reason, I decline to take any part in the discussion of this committee's report in respect to Bill C-14, and I reserve my right to speak in extenso, I might say, when the bill is before the Senate on second reading.

Senator Benidickson: You may speak all night on second reading of the bill when it comes, Senator Roblin, if you like.

Senator Roblin: Thank you, my honourable friend. I will likely do so.

Senator Benidickson: And we can stay here until after Christmas to listen to you.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I should like to intervene at this stage, I hope in a conciliatory way, with reference to the points Senator Roblin has been making.

I do not want to pose as an elder statesman or as a wise man, but I remember when I came to the Senate 25 years ago that at every adjournment, the Senate was faced with what Senator Hayden has so often called "the adjournment closure". In other words, bills were presented to us at the last moment and there was not sufficient time to deal with the subject matter of those bills. That has been particularly true of financial bills, appropriation bills, which have often been the last bills to come to us before an adjournment.

I remember well the complaining that was done at that time, but I also remember coming to the galleries here long before I was in the Senate and hearing the same plea, that the Senate was being dealt with unfairly and that it was required to be a rubber stamp.

● (1550)

During my time as Leader of the Government in the Senate, a new procedure was initiated with regard to appropriation bills, one that is more effective now than it was initially. That procedure is to refer estimates, upon which appropriation bills are based, to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. This enables senators who are concerned about any item in the estimates, or in the appropriation bill already tabled or given first reading in the other place—and perhaps given further consideration than first reading—to familiarize themselves with both the bill and the estimates upon which the bill is based. It meant that the report of the National Finance Committee, received and debated by the Senate before the appropriation bill reached us, would, in effect, have been debated to the general satisfaction of the Senate.

Honourable senators, I should like to make this point abundantly clear: the purpose of that exercise was to enable the Senate to escape from the unfair arrangements prevailing in Parliament up to that time, which put the Senate in an invidious position year after year, session after session, and, indeed, adjournment after adjournment.

It is my belief that the procedure has worked. The Senate has gone on and developed a new procedure which is becoming somewhat of a convention, in that the pre-study of other bills ensures that the Senate will not be caught in any unfair position as a result of mismanagement, poor management, or other political factors that might very well delay legislation coming here in time for adequate consideration to be given to it.

It is important that the Senate should give the subject matter of a bill adequate consideration, and I submit, honourable senators, that whether that is done on and after second reading, or at the stage which we have reached in connection with this bill—as a result of a report coming from a committee—is irrelevant. The debate goes on, either on second reading, or at the report stage arising from a committee's pre-study of the bill. That is a very important point to consider.

I value what Senator Roblin has said, that we debate the principle of the bill on second reading. But, Senator Roblin and honourable senators, it is simply because of this rather unfair practice—which nevertheless is proper parliamentary practice—that in many instances it has not been possible for the Senate, even on important appropriation bills, because of the late hour in a session, or before an adjournment, to give such bills adequate study.

I can understand what Senator Roblin is arguing for, and, in normal parliamentary practice, he is completely right. But we, in this chamber, have found that for our own protection, and to avoid the unfairness that develops from such practices in the other place—which take no account of the problems of the Senate—we have had to take steps to protect ourselves from that kind of behaviour.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I would very much have liked to have seen the present situation used as an example of what the Senate can do. There may be speeches which honourable senators might wish to make on second reading when the bill reaches us. I would have hoped, in the interests of saving parliamentary time, that those speeches would have been made at the report stage. Presumably all items in the bill have been considered by the committee and the minutes of those committee hearings are now available to honourable senators. I would have thought that the views which honourable senators might express on second reading could have been presented just as effectively at this stage, and ultimately would have saved parliamentary time in dealing with the bill when it reaches us from the other chamber, having passed there on third reading.

We are developing new procedures for the Senate, and some are being developed for our own protection. We have to keep that very firmly in mind when we find ourselves in situations such as the one in which we find ourselves today.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, in saying a few words on the proposition before us, I must include a compliment to my good friend, Senator Roblin, a former Premier of Manitoba, originally my province. We also have a more personal relationship.

Prior to a Christmas, or Easter, or any other adjournment or occasion when there might be pressure on the Senate, I have stated, and have intended one day to deliver, my absolute opposition to being asked to accept certain types of legislation at this stage of a session.

I must say to Senator Roblin, who is new to us and is of value to us, that this is an improvement upon what he might have met with on previous occasions prior to a Christmas or Easter adjournment, without there having been what I would have considered to be adequate consideration from the other house in which I sat for 20 years. Too often the legislation involved social welfare, or cheques that might be issued within days to needy people; and the other place put us in an invidious position. I stated last session, I believe, that I would sit here until hell freezes over rather than experience another situation of that kind, much as I respect the House of Commons.

• (1600)

I do say to my colleagues, however, that I think we have here at least one important improvement. I refer to the fact that this particular bill, which is of great consequence in terms of dollars and cents to a great number of people across the country, as well as being of great social consequence generally, has been studied—and studied in great detail—in anticipation of its arrival here by the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, under the chairmanship of Senator Bonnell.

We are not subject to a single criticism on matters of this kind from the media, who sometimes neglect our senatorial debates. This is a new departure. This is a new step for the Senate. This goes beyond the Hayden type of pre-study of bills. If the Senate passes this bill tonight, no part of the media anywhere will be able to say that we have not given it prudent consideration.

As in the case of other bills that have this welfare implication, and which, if delayed, may result in the late delivery of cheques to needy people, I for one—and I think Senator Roblin is another—would be prepared to sit here tomorrow and Sunday and even after Christmas, to deal with this bill. However, I deplore the fact that my associates in the other house, prior to Christmas and Easter, seem always to send to the Senate bills that are humane in their intent, that are important, that may have been subject to filibuster, and that require assent before the normal parliamentary recess can begin.

I have said before, and I say again, that I am prepared to stop them if they do not consider the Senate. We, of course, have hearts, and we realize that many of these bills involve cheques going out 15 days hence to needy recipients. This, I am sure, will be in our minds tonight as we consider this bill. I repeat, I am prepared to sit tomorrow, or after Christmas, if that is Senator Roblin's suggestion.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, perhaps I may venture to say something on the point that has been raised by Senator Roblin, and on the comments we have just had from the Honourable Senator Benidickson.

First of all, as to the comments from the Honourable Senator Benidickson, I think it ought to be noted that any delay we are imposing now upon the passage of this legislation is not going to prevent cheques being sent to the needy; it is going to result in cheques not being cancelled. That is about what it amounts to. This is not a bill to give more money to anybody; it is a bill to take money away from somebody, and the very justified point that Senator Benidickson makes about some other kinds of legislation does not apply here at all. We can sit here until next Christmas but one on this, and no one would be a penny the worse.

It seems to me that the real point of the objection that Senator Roblin raised has been missed. I cannot undertake to speak for him, or for anybody but myself; but it seemed to me not that he was attacking the idea of a pre-study, or the Hayden formula—

Senator Roblin: That is correct.

Senator Forsey:—but that, to use the phrase of the Honourable Senator Benidickson, he was suggesting that this particular proceeding seems to go beyond the Hayden formula.

I thoroughly agree with all that Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) said on this subject, but there are two questions I would like to ask. First of all, is it usual to have a report of a pre-study which approves the principle of the bill which has been the subject, or partial subject, of that pre-study? I cannot recall, offhand, but I should like to ask those whose memories are better than mine, and who have had more experience of this house than I have, whether it is customary for a report of a pre-study to approve the principle of a bill.

The second question I want to ask is, if we adopt a report of a pre-study which approves the principle of a bill, what effect does that have when we get to the second reading stage? When we get to the second reading, are we going to be told that it has become a pure formality, that the house has already approved the principle of the bill and, therefore, there is really nothing to debate? That seems to me to be the essence of the point that Senator Roblin was trying to make, and I am inclined to think it is a serious one.

I defer to those whose knowledge of the rules is greater; I defer to those whose experience of past practice is greater; but I should certainly like to have some consideration of that particular point which I took to be the essence of the objection Senator Roblin was raising. Certainly it is the essence of the qualms that I have about the adoption of this particular report.

Senator Bonnell: In answer to my honourable friend, I would say that I did not move that the report be adopted. I do not want to give the false impression that we are deciding something here before second reading. I think what has been said is completely irrelevant.

Senator Forsey: I thought it was a motion for consideration. Is the motion then not to be put? Is there no motion before us? Has Her Honour not put the question: Is it your pleasure honourable senators to adopt the motion?—or are we merely discussing something in vacuum?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I explained that yesterday when I referred to rule 68. This report is tabled in the Senate merely for the information of the house. The Senate is not being asked to approve the report. The report is merely tabled for the information of the house, and the motion of the chairman of the committee was that we give consideration to this information. The Senate is not being asked to approve the principle of the bill.

Senator Perrault: Just to consider the information.

Senator Forsey: So, in fact, there will be no adoption of anything as a result of this motion?

Senator Langlois: It is just to consider the information provided.

Senator Forsey: That answers my question.

Senator Bonnell: Just to clarify the matter further, I refer to page 407 of yesterday's Debates of the Senate, where I am reported as saying:

Honourable senators, with leave, I move that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on the subject matter of Bill C-14, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, which was tabled this day, be taken into consideration now.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, now that it appears that the report has been considered, and a number of comments have been heard, it may be appropriate now to await arrival of the bill from the other place. I understand a vote is under way at the present time. There is no approval of the principle of this bill.

Senator Roblin: I thank the Leader of the Government for that explanation because it certainly relieves my mind about the procedures we have been following. In other words, we are just talking.

Senator Perrault: Yes, and I think we have all benefited from the views expressed by Senator Roblin and other senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this Order is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.50 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a second time?

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved that the bill be now read the second time.

He said: Honourable senators, I have the unenviable task of introducing this bill on second reading today. I feel very much like Mr. Scrooge when he looked at the knocker on his door and saw Marley's face. In this case the knocker seems to have the visage of Senator Forsey, and I hope I will not have to go through Christmas Past, Present and Future tonight.

Honourable senators are aware, of course, that this bill has been before the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for three weeks. It comes to us tonight with three amendments, which I should like to deal with. By way of amplification, I should say that the policy behind this bill is really very simple, but the mechanics are very, very complex. Any parliamentarian who presumed to suggest amendments to this bill would be presupposing a knowledge of the economic impact far beyond what I think would be within the capacity of any of us.

● (1700)

I want to thank Senator Bonnell, the chairman of the committee, and Senator Bird, and particularly Senator Thompson, for relieving me of the burden of a second reading introduction. They have said, by and large, exactly what I would have said and specified the same reservations about the bill as I would express.

When we adjourned last week, I went home to study the bill and also, really for the first time, to study the Unemployment Insurance Act. At that time I had many reservations about the mechanics to be adopted; many reservations about the way the bill was being implemented; and concern about what appeared to be a lack of consultation with the areas of the public to be affected. However, having done my homework over the weekend I have turned around the other way and I now feel that this is a very thoughtful piece of legislation. It is brought in at a time when we have astronomic economic problems and deficits occurring in the Unemployment Insurance Fund. I ask any of the members opposite how they would handle this situation.

First of all, I think we must remember that this was originally intended to be an insurance scheme. I will not absolve the government—this government—from the blame, because in 1971 that policy was departed from and abrogated. I wish we in the Senate had been sufficiently prescient to realize what those amendments would bring about. However, hindsight is easy, and I should like to remind the house that the government's contribution to this fund in 1972 was $880 million, and it rose to $1.788 million in 1977. Obviously, no responsible government could accept this escalation. The question is: How do we go about eliminating this escalation? Well, I suppose we could eliminate government support for the program and leave it entirely in the hands of the employers and employees. However, I am afraid that would probably be the most heartless thing that a Canadian government could do. Under the scheme embodied in this bill, the government is starting to move toward a self-supporting insurance scheme, and it is doing so in a way that probably involves the best instincts that could be brought to bear on the subject.

I mentioned before that, although the policy is clear, the mechanics of the bill are very complex. I will not go into them this evening, because I know honourable senators are familiar with them. I would just reiterate the five basic thrusts in the bill.

First of all, there is a higher entrance requirement for repeaters; that is, people who have been on unemployment insurance and are reclaiming. New entrants to the labour market will have to considerably increase their attachment to that market before they become eligible for benefits.

There is the controversial one of the increase in minimum insurable earnings using hours per week instead of, or in addition to, dollars per week earned. There is the reduction in weekly benefits from 66⅔ per cent to 60 per cent of average pay. There is a provision for recovery of benefits paid from those who, thereafter, are in a high income bracket. There is refinancing of the labour force extended benefits to share with the private sector, both employers and employees, the burden that the government now carries alone.

The savings that will be realized by the federal government, and the breakdown of where those savings will come from, have been outlined by Senator Thompson. If I wish to gauge the impact of this measure, I would have to do so against the background of public opinion. I do not think the government is moving in any way contrary to public opinion with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act and its administration. There is a good deal of evidence that the public, including those members of the public who are insurable wage earners, feel that this scheme is subject to abuse. In fact, 90 per cent of Canadians feel that stricter controls are needed; that we should ensure, by whatever means necessary, that the beneficiaries under the Unemployment Insurance Act not be those who refuse to take a job. According to polls taken, three-quarters of the adult population are of the view that stricter eligibility requirements are necessary. These are obviously not polls that I personally commissioned, but certainly my experience would lead me to support those figures. They are government figures.

Honourable senators, the bill as we have it before us contains three amendments which were not in the first reading version with which the committee dealt in its pre-study. The committee did, however, take into account two of those amendments as the possibility of their acceptance was known during the pre-study. The first of the amendments provides that persons are not precluded from obtaining benefits through lack of qualifying work time due to pregnancy.

In the original bill, incapacity was ruled out, or was not included in exclusions from work time—that is, incapacity due to illness, injury or quarantine. To that has been added what I would only put in quotation marks, the “disability” of pregnancy.

There has been another amendment which deals with the calculation of the rate of unemployment. This is found in clause 7 of the bill, where there are the words:

—incorporating in such rates an estimate of the rates of unemployment for status Indians living on Indian reserves.

In other words, where an area includes an Indian reserve, the unemployment amongst those Indians living on the reserve would be taken into account for computing the rate for the whole area.

Senator Benidickson: That has not been the previous practice?

Senator Lang: No. There is one other amendment which is purely technical, and which involves a change of numbering in clause 145 on page 8. That was a purely typographical error in the bill as it went to the House of Commons on first reading.

I think honourable senators will agree that the inclusion of pregnancy in terms of calculating eligibility, the incorporation of unemployment rates amongst Indians, and the inclusion of that rate for the purpose of calculating the unemployment rate of an area, are provisions that none of us could quarrel with. The third amendment, as I mentioned, was to correct a typographical error.

Honourable senators, I have the biggest briefing book that I have ever seen in the course of my time in the Senate, and it contains impact studies of these amendments, which studies were all before our committee. It describes the increase in fines for improper reporting, and gives the details of the repeater clauses and the new entrants clauses. I am satisfied as never before of the competence of the officials involved in preparing this bill and studying the potential impact of its provisions.

I do not wish to repeat what we have been through now for three weeks in committee, and I do not wish to go over matters that have been dealt with by Senator Bonnell, Senator Thompson and Senator Bird. However, I should like to underscore one fact. Responsibility in government is now one of our major concerns, and that involves financial responsibility. For too long now we have been using various acts of Parliament for purposes for which they were not designed. I say that that is particularly the case with the Income Tax Act. In 1971 this government started to distort the insurance concept under the Unemployment Insurance Act by turning it into a guaranteed annual income or welfare concept. Once we start to do that sort of thing we engage in what I would term legislative dishonesty. But the government is now trying to bring this act back to its original purpose. It is also trying to avoid an expenditure that is now at the point of $1.7 billion per year and escalating at a rate which is almost impossible to predict and not in line with the realities of its financial capabilities.

This is a responsible bill. It is a humane bill. It attempts to accomplish its results by affecting those people who will be least concerned with its effect. Combined with this bill is the opportunity to utilize savings produced in this area through the positive creation of new jobs.

Let us not forget that we cannot drive ourselves into bankruptcy, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, create a positive and flourishing economy. Without qualification I can say to honourable senators that I support the policy behind this bill, the principle, and above all I support the mechanisms that are being used to accomplish the results. They are humane; they are well thought out, and I defy anyone to devise a better scheme.

This bill has been in committee now for three weeks and I hope the Senate will not feel it necessary tonight to refer it to committee once again. I shall be glad to try to answer, from what limited knowledge I have of the whole aspect of insurance schemes of this nature, any questions that senators may raise. If any senator feels inclined to propose a specific amendment I would caution him or her that I will want to hear how the financial impact of that amendment is arrived at, and just what the financial impact will be. I suggest that that might be done on third reading. However, on such matters I am in the hands of the Senate.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), that this debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Perrault: No.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Lang for second reading of the Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, it is evident that it is time for me to take my part in this debate, after having tested the opinion of the house with respect to the adjournment, and having acknowledged that the "gang of four," courtesy of Senator Lamontagne, have failed in their purpose, I just hope our ultimate destiny is not as unpleasant as that which is apparently intended for the original "gang of four."

However that may be, I think that Senator Lang deserved, and I think received, the sympathetic attention of this house on his introduction at the second reading stage of Bill C-14, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1971, because although Bill C-14 seems deceptively short—there are only 12 pages in it—its ramifications are detailed, widespread and complex. If it is passed, it will have a direct effect on over 1.8 million Canadians, and on a good many people who are unemployed in this country.

When I started to examine this measure I took a look at the unemployment insurance legislation, with its relevant orders in council, and there are some 234 pages of that. In addition, I have been studying some of the material presented by the government in this bill; the impact study for the proposed changes; and the description of the 48 economic regions into which the country is to be divided, and there is a great deal, materially, in that. I think I would be a brave man if I attempted to assure this body that I am completely familiar with all the information that is there.

The House of Commons has laboured since November 9 until tonight in its consideration of this measure, so as I attempt to analyze Bill C-14 today I am sure that matters of detail and some important technicalities may escape me. However, I am clear that the important principles involved in the bill are plain for all to see, and it is in connection with a matter of principle we are to concern ourselves this evening.

To explicate those principles it is necessary to examine something of the background of unemployment insurance in Canada, because it has been and it is an essential element in the Canadian economic structure. It has underwritten better standards of life for countless men and women in the Canadian wage system who at one time or another have found themselves unemployed. Over the years it has been reasonably effective in softening some of the harsh impact of temporary unemployment. It has rendered the downside swing in economic conditions, which often bear very heavily on the less fortunate sections of our population, more tolerable for the hundreds and thousands of workers who have been adversely affected by unemployment from time to time.

When you consider that this year there are officially 850,000 people out of work, and perhaps some more if you believe all the information that comes to you, obviously an unemployment insurance policy is a necessary and essential measure for the conduct of our affairs.

As others have said—and I intend to go over it again—when this policy was first brought into effect, it was basically a system of wage insurance. Certain levels of wages were protected for certain periods of time, and certain classes of workers were covered who, together with their employers, paid the premiums that were necessary to provide the complete financing of the project.

Since its inception, however, the Unemployment Insurance Act has undergone a sea change and, as a result, the welfare and income transfer payment factors that we now see in the bill were introduced. It appeared to some that these welfare and income transfer influences were gradually submerging the insurance principle.

In this course of events, among other developments, new classes were brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I recall one that I dealt with at another time when provincial government employees were brought under the scheme. These classes, of course, were originally excluded from unemployment insurance because it was thought that insurance was not needed for those people since there was a negligible risk of unemployment. I still think that point of view is correct. However, these additions no doubt strengthen the finances of the plan, but it is not surprising that those concerned regard their contribution not so much as an insurance premium but as a wage tax. I would submit to the chamber that that is, in fact, what it is.

Then, in 1971 we had the so-called Mackasey amendments. I learned the other day that Mr. Mackasey did not actually develop those amendments himself; he inherited them from someone else, and it is unfortunate that Mr. Mackasey seems to bear the burden of responsibility because he introduced them in 1971. These so-called Mackasey amendments greatly widened the scope of the plan because they lowered the benefit threshold; provided longer benefit periods; liberalized the terms of eligibility; and moved further away from the original basis of unemployment insurance. However, I think it fair to say that this shift away from the insurance principle and towards welfare and income transfer principles was recognized in part by the undertaking of the government at that time to pay certain extended benefit outlays from public funds, instead of insisting that these extended benefits should be contributed by the private sector in the form of contributions from workers and employers.

That is a very sketchy history of some of the principal facts in the development of unemployment insurance policy in this country. It touches only some of the highlights, to be sure, and is intended only to give a rough indication of the direction in which unemployment insurance is moving, and perhaps to give the principal reason why we have this Bill C-14 in front of us at the present time. It serves to tell us why; it serves to tell us why, especially since the full impact of the 1971 changes have begun to sink in; why there is widespread public concern that the unemployment insurance plan is not working the way many people think it should; and perhaps the explanation as to why we have the skyrocketing costs, and the explanation as to why 88 per cent of the people in Canada, on a polling basis, are calling for some reforms and changes in the unemployment insurance system of Canada.

Some of these concerns surfaced, as has been mentioned, in the 1978 report of the Auditor General when he was examining the 1977 operations of the Unemployment Insurance Fund. He reported an overpayment in that period of $209 million. Of this sum, $67 million was reported by the Unemployment Insurance Commission itself. While on a testing sampling basis conducted by the Auditor General, he came to the conclusion that an additional estimated amount of $142 million probably was also overpaid. He had his range from $99 million to $179 million, so you can see that this figure is not a factual one but the best estimate that could be arrived at.

Even so, $209 million is a significant sum of money. True, it is about 5 per cent of the $4 billion paid out in last year's employment insurance premiums, but it is a partial measure of one of the problems which perhaps—and I don't wish to be too harsh in this statement, but it seems to be a fact—is a combination of inefficiency on the part of those who are running the Unemployment Insurance Commission and, possibly, misuse by the general public which ought not to take place. Even so, if the 5 per cent overpayment was all that we had to worry about, perhaps that would not be the cause of the public concern that we see today, and it is certainly not the sole cause of public concern.

Public apprehension about unemployment insurance is over more than overpayments. It is about the perception that too many people are manipulating the system in ways that may be within the law. Indeed, disincentives to work under the unemployment insurance plan are positively encouraged by some aspects of this law, and these take place at the expense of the working public, and indeed at the expense of the great majority of the conscientious unemployed. It is wrong to seek to label all those who are connected with this plan as recipients as being people who are perhaps manipulating the plan. However, there is this element that we must face, because it is a fact that some people are manipulating the system, not so much by infringing the rules, not by being dishonest, but by using the rules, and using the rules in a way which some people think results in a milking of the fund.

But, I would not have anyone in this chamber imagine that the unemployed are solely to blame for this situation. Evidence was presented at another committee of the Senate, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which illustrates starkly how far the rot has gone in this question of manipulating the rules. I will give you a couple of examples from that committee's testimony.

In 1977, the Government of Nova Scotia had a job-corps plan going. This was open to students and non-students alike. It covered a 12-week period of employment. That 12-week period is important because at that time—and I guess still and until this bill is passed—it qualified people for benefits. It qualified people for 40 weeks of benefit payments in a high unemployment area like the province of Nova Scotia. So, you can see what happened. This provincial government paid the minimum wage for 12 weeks to the people enrolled under this scheme, and afterwards the Unemployment Insurance Commission paid them benefits of two-thirds of the minimum wage for an additional 40 weeks. The Chronicle Herald, in an editorial written about that time, gently pointed to this elegant milking of the Unemployment Insurance Fund by a government body.

The same committee was told that there were some universities in Ontario which were tailoring the contracts of their non-tenured faculty in order to fit unemployment rules and, by carefully phrasing the employment contract, they could get unemployment insurance benefits for these people during the normal university summer recess. That could not be done for tenured people, who are on a 12-month contract, but we were told in that committee that this was taking place with respect to non-tenured people by a public body of the sort that I have described. Talk about your disincentives!

But, there is another angle of disincentives, and there are so many of them that are built into the very structure of the system. While I am bringing these points to the attention of the Senate, I am not doing so from the point of view of presenting horror stories. There are plenty of horror stories if you want to look for them. I am not presenting them to the Senate as a means of pointing the finger at any particular group in society, but to explain, as best I can, how some of our problems arise because of the very structure of the system we are dealing with. The rules allow this kind of thing to be done.

Listen to some more. If you were working a 40-hour week at the minimum wage, you would be paid $120 a week. The maximum current unemployment insurance payment is $160 a week. The difference in favour of not working is $40 a week. It is not surprising that that becomes a considerable disincentive for going off the unemployment insurance and taking jobs at the basic wage of the province, namely, $3 per hour, but it indicates the kind of thing that makes people think the system is not working the way it should. That piece of information, incidentally, I gleaned from the testimony of the Minister of Social Services of New Brunswick.

Senator Thompson: I wonder if the honourable senator would mind my asking him a question? I am a little confused how, if you are working at a minimum wage, you will get the maximum unemployment insurance benefit of $160.

Senator Roblin: I did not explain it very well. Let me go over it and see if I can get the idea across. You are working at a wage that entitles you to $160 U.I. That is the wage you came off—one that gives you $160 minimum U.I. Now you are looking for another job. All you can find is one at the minimum wage of $120. As I say, there is a 40-dollar incentive to stay on the benefits and not take this substandard job at the minimum wage.

Another interesting example on the same subject was presented by the minister from Ontario. He looked at it this way, and perhaps this will explain it a little differently. If one's pay is $200 per week, the unemployment insurance benefit is $133.33, and one is allowed part-time earnings of $33.30. If one went on unemployment insurance and then took a part-time job, one would make $166.66. There isn't much incentive to go back to full-time employment at $200 a week if one is only $23 better off.

This is the kind of problem people drafting unemployment insurance laws are up against, and they are difficult laws to draft. If public bodies—and I have mentioned a couple—take the view of the unemployment insurance system that I have described, it is hard to come down on the heads of private citizens who prove themselves equally as ingenious at finding ways to make the system work to their own advantage. Even if the great majority of unemployed Canadians respect the integrity of the unemployment insurance system—and I completely believe they do—it is not hard to understand why unemployment insurance costs are so enormous, and it is not hard to understand why public dissatisfaction with the workings of the system is widespread.

Just to add a complicating thought to this line of reasoning I am attempting to develop, emphasis is added when it is recognized that only 10 per cent or less of those whose benefits are exhausted proceed from the unemployment insurance roles to the welfare roles. The federal government will not admit the 10 per cent figure. In their discussions with the provinces, they have been saying it is about 5 per cent. I think 10 per cent is not an unfair figure.

While I do not intend this to be an exhaustive review of the situation, other speakers have added important points which I wish to acknowledge at this stage. The evidence is overwhelming that the unemployment insurance system needs a complete reconstruction. It is the actual design of the plan which leads to much of the abuse of which we are complaining. We should not seek only to penalize all individual Canadians who are unemployed, as Bill C-14 does, in my respectful opinion. If we want to go after the abusers, we should go after them directly. We need an income replacement plan that is financially sound and socially just. That is what public opinion is demanding today. Canadians want to see a reduction in unemployment insurance costs; they want to see a move as far as possible away from disincentives to work, and a move toward incentive to work. They want a plan that will play fair with the 1.8 million people who received unemployment insurance benefits in 1977.

If you have agreed with my analysis so far, the question obviously arises: How does Bill C-14 measure up to this set of standards or criteria? If it measures up, it is to a rather inadequate degree. It does reduce costs. It does reduce work incentives, though it is hard to say by how much. However, it is headed in the right direction. It adopts inferior measures insensitive to need, and sadly unfair to youth, women, people in the Atlantic provinces and people in the province of Quebec.

While I can support the principle of Bill C-14 as far as it goes, I can only do so in the hope that the bill can be subsequently amended to mitigate its injustices to thousands of workers, and to render its virtues, such as they are, more meaningful and effective. From that it can be taken that I hope at some stage in the proceedings to move amendments to this bill.

What does this bill do? It has five main features, the first of which is that it strikes 250,000 people off the benefits roll, all of whom probably paid premiums. These 250,000 people comprise several classes. We are given a list in the yellow book which I showed honourable senators at the outset of my remarks. First, there are the repeaters. According to the list, we have 55,000 repeaters. That is interesting. Given that we have 850,000 people officially unemployed and there are only 50,000 official unfilled jobs in the country, it is not surprising that there are a lot of repeaters.

While I listened carefully to Senator Thompson's speech in which he outlined the government's measures for retraining and job creation, and while I by no means wish to downgrade that effort—in fact, it is important that it be done—I think in passing it is also fair to say that, insofar as training is concerned, we seem to be training people for the wrong jobs. We cannot seem to supply skilled people for the jobs that are available.

Senator McElman: Retraining is a provincial matter.

Senator Roblin: I put all programs, provincial or federal, into the one basket. One of the important tasks that lies ahead for both levels of government is to key the job-training structure into the jobs that are probably going to be available. That is something that has not been fully successful. We have had statistics regarding the employment of those who have been retrained, but I would like to know how many of those people are employed in a job for which they were retrained. I think it would be fewer than the statistics, as given, would have us believe.

If we want to help these people, we can only hope and pray—I am reduced to prayer—that the training programs will be more effective than they have been in the past. The government has expended vast amounts of money on job creation programs, such as the Canada Works Program. Very often the jobs created disappear in six weeks. I suppose it is necessary to try, and I suppose it is necessary to keep on trying, but the results of those programs have not been encouraging. We need to get our economy in shape so that we have fewer bona fide unemployed than we have at the present time.

The second category making up the 250,000 who have been struck off the rolls is that of new entrants and re-entrants, of whom there are 159,000. This category is comprised, for the most part, of youth, women and seasonal workers. In her excellent speech, Senator Bird described how that particular clause in the bill affects the women of Canada. I can do no better than to recommend to honourable senators that they read her words. A further change in the regulations affects a further 42,000, for a grand total of 250,000.

It is all very well to try to get at the malingerers, but to use a broad axe such as this will result in not only the pine tree, but every tree in the forest, coming down.

The bill reduces the benefits of all other unemployment insurance claimants, comprising about 1.5 million people in all. The first lot are out, and the benefits of the second lot are reduced from 66½ per cent of average salary to 60 per cent.

I ask the honourable senators to consider the impact of the two proposals I have mentioned to this point—the striking off the rolls of 250,000 people and reducing benefits for the rest—on the disadvantaged regions of the country to which reference has already been made, Atlantic Canada and Quebec.

To illustrate how these proposals would affect those regions, 10 years ago the rate of unemployment in the more fortunate provinces of Canada differed from the less fortunate, the differential then being 2.9 per cent. That differential has now increased to 7.9 per cent. This illustrates the problem—a tremendous increase in the proportion of unemployment between one section of the country and the other. It illustrates the problem of attempting to produce a better element of fairness in the unemployment insurance system of our country. And I regret that although I am in favour of restraint, I think the way that it is being done bears with undue harshness on the people in that part of Canada, as it does on women and new entrants like young people and those who are coming back to unemployment insurance because they have lost their job again.

What is the third of my three factors? The third is a transfer. I have been watching with interest the financial manipulations of the Government of Canada in order to get the cost down, and believe me they are a pretty ingenious bunch. I take my hat off to them, because here they have found an ideal way of transferring costs from their backs on to somebody else's, for which they will get very little criticism, I suspect. This bill provides that $400 million of the $892 million that it purports to save arises from the transfer from the public to the private sector of certain extended benefits.

Now I must be careful. My $400 million figure may be the maximum or it may be somewhat less than that, because there are shifts of other costs which have to be taken into account and I do not have that figure in my head. But it is sufficient to illustrate that there is this enormous transfer of costs for paying for certain extended benefits from the public to the private sector. And so the private sector would have been able to reduce its premiums paid by workers and by management to some extent if this transfer had not been made. But now that it is going to be made, they are not going to be able to reduce it by very much—a little, but not by the full amount that they might otherwise have expected. But the federal government's financial burden will be reduced to that extent.

Then we have factor number 4 in my list of features of this bill, and that is that in cutting off unemployment insurance benefits the way it does, it is going to shift a certain amount of cost from the federal treasury to the treasuries of the provinces, and there has been a lot of argument about this. The reason for that is, of course, that people who are cut off from unemployment insurance may apply for welfare. There has been a lot of argument as to how much. I am not in a position to judge that sort of thing, but I can tell you that the federal government admits that $25 million net—and that is the net, not the gross—will be picked up by the provinces, and the figures that the provinces are talking about are just about double that, somewhere in the region of $44 million. Whatever it may be, it is a pretty substantial sum that is going to be shifted. So we have two instances of shifting the cost to others, to say nothing of the cost that is shifted to the backs of the unemployed.

The fifth factor of this bill that is of real interest is that it saves the federal treasury an estimated $892 million, and that is certainly a considerable contribution towards restraint and cannot be ignored. Other features of the bill, and there are many, I shall leave to others to describe.

To sum up the principles of Bill C-14, a cost restraint is imposed, although a good deal has been shifted merely from one set of payers, the federal government, to another set, people in jobs, employers and the provincial governments. Work disincentives are reduced marginally, in my opinion. I suppose when one considers these two factors, as I said before, one might be induced to support the principle of the bill, but when it comes to the ways and means by which this has been achieved, and when it comes to the effectiveness, to the equity, to the fairness of the measures outlined in the bill, it is just about as far from being satisfactory as it could possibly be. So I have to tell my honourable friends that I am going to have to talk to myself quite firmly to vote for this bill on second reading. I only do so in the expectation of being able to place before this house suggestions that will improve it, increase the restraint and savings and distribute the impact of the thrust of this bill more fairly and, to some extent, decrease the work disincentive features which are causing so much trouble.

The most significant change I want to make was recommended to us by the provinces—not by one province, not by two provinces, but, mirabile dictu, by all ten provinces of Canada. You can start in the west with the Social Credit Government of British Columbia; you can proceed on to the Progressive Conservative Governments of Alberta, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario; you can go back and pick up the NDP Government of Saskatchewan; you can move on to the Parti Québécois Government of Quebec and you can go to Prince Edward Island where they still have a Liberal government, and you will find that they are all on the same wavelength. They are all in favour of the proposal which I intend to place before you now. To have ten provinces and five political parties all on the same wavelength is quite unusual in this country today. I only wish we could sometimes get the same thing going in dominion-provincial conferences, provided they could occasionally agree with the federal government as well.

However, the proposal that they put forward was that we should distinguish between two kinds of unemployed. We should distinguish between those who have dependants and those who do not have dependants. I think the logic of that argument is well understood. Twenty-seven per cent of the people on unemployment insurance are unemployed with dependants; 73 per cent are unemployed without dependants. So their proposal was that instead of a flat, across-the-board reduction from 66½ per cent to 60 per cent, there should be a dual rate; that the 66½ per cent rate should be retained for those unemployed with dependants, and that the 66½ per cent rate should be reduced to 50 per cent for those unemployed without dependants.

That distinction between the jobless with dependants and the jobless without dependants, in my view, gives no offence to natural justice. Indeed, it is recognized in our tax laws. Those of us in provinces concerned with workmen's compensation, which is a kind of insurance, know about it. It is in the Canada Pension Plan and it is in a variety of public measures. Furthermore, it has the distinction, as has been told to us this afternoon, of having been part of the unemployment insurance pattern in the past. That distinction between those with dependants and those without dependants was in the administration of the act from 1940 to 1970 and from 1971 to 1975. That indicates to me that it is administratively feasible.

If you accept the principle that there is a measure of justice in making this distinction between those who have responsibilities for others and those who do not—and I for one accept that distinction—let me try to tell you what it means in dollars and cents so that you can understand the concrete impact of a proposal of this sort. I am using the figures that were presented by the Province of Ontario, dealing with the effects under the new maximum benefit standards that are in Bill C-14. You understand that the bill includes, among other things, an increase in the standards that they are using.

Well, workers with dependants under this two-tier plan would receive $176.27 at the maximum. That is $18 more that they would get now. In this period of inflation and of rising costs of living, I do not think any of them would object to that. It is a 10 per cent increase, but it is for people who have dependants for whom they are responsible.

For those workers without dependants, the new maximum benefit under Bill C-14 would be $132.50. That is $37 less than they receive now. We might just as well face up to that fact when we are considering this two-tier system. So workers with dependants on the maximum benefits under Bill C-14 would get $18 more than they do now, and workers without would get $37 less than they do now. But I think it would introduce into this measure a degree of equity that is absent at the present time.

This proposal would eliminate, I suppose, 100 per cent of the cost of welfare shift feature that I have mentioned with respect to provincial welfare budgets. I think also that if that were the change made in the act, it would simplify greatly the administrative aspects of it in comparison with this cut-off of the 250,000 and all those other changes that I have mentioned.

I put it to the Senate that not only is the differential defensible on the grounds of policy, but it has a significant financial benefit instead, because it provides the funds—here I want to be very clear—to reinstate on unemployment insurance those 250,000 people who would be struck out by the workings of this bill.

It is 6 o'clock, Madam Speaker, and with your consent I shall resume my remarks afterwards.

Senator Perrault: If the honourable senator would like to complete his remarks, the government would like to co-operate with him. He may do whatever he wishes.

Senator Roblin: If honourable senators can bear with me for another ten minutes or so, I will complete my speech.

To come back to my point, if we adopt the two-tier system, benefits could be restored to the new entrants; benefits could be restored to the re-entrants and the repeaters. The bias against this class would be removed insofar as they are totally outside the purview of Bill C-14, and there would be a better deal for young people and a better deal for women, because they would be on the system.

I have to admit that this proposal probably does not go as far as Senator Bird would like to see it go, but I hope, and I suggest, that it is an improvement, so far as women are concerned, over the bill that we have before us at the present time. It would certainly be a very significant factor for the high unemployment areas in Canada, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces. In my view, that goes without saying, and if anyone has paid any attention to the figures in this yellow book, that fact will be made abundantly clear.

I would also suggest that to an extent the two-tier system would decrease, more than Bill C-14 decreases, the work disincentive features of the current act. I make no grand claims for the disincentive effects of paying 50 per cent of the rate of benefit to people without dependants, but it certainly reinforces whatever disincentive features there are in the bill at the present time, and probably experience would indicate that it would be quite valuable.

I now come to my second proposal, and I would like honourable senators to note that the change I have just recommended, together with the second proposal I shall offer, increases federal government savings by about $162 million over the savings claimed for Bill C-14, despite the fact that it takes in again, under the aegis of the unemployment insurance arrangements, the new entrants, the re-entrants, and the repeaters that are to be removed as things stand at present.

My second proposal is one that will be familiar to this chamber. It is that those who leave their jobs without just cause should be considered in this operation. This category is not mentioned in the bill, but I must say frankly that there are 220,000 people in this category who in 1977 received benefits amounting to $450,000.

I want to make it perfectly clear that people have a right to quit their jobs, for just cause or for no cause, and we should recognize that right. It would not be good for people, men and women, to think that they were completely at the mercy of their employer with respect to their job situation. They have a right to quit. At the present time these quitters are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits after six weeks' unemployment. My proposal is that we should increase this waiting period from six weeks to 12 weeks. I suggest that this increase is not unreasonable in the circumstances of people who leave their jobs, and I suggest that it reinforces the policy of restraint about which we have been speaking.

It seems to me, as I look back upon Bill C-14, that we can ascertain its genesis with some degree of certainty. I suggest that after certain television appearances of August last, there was a flurry of ad hoc measures to cut costs, and Bill C-14 is, I think, one of these measures, but it uses a meat-axe, and the justice it metes out is very rough. The few changes in Bill C-14 which I shall propose, one to clause 5 and one by way of a new clause, have the same thrust, but it is my conviction that they do it in a much better way.

The proposals I intend to introduce at the next stage will save more money. They will save $162 million more, and will raise the amount of savings from $892 million to $1,054 million. The burden of the savings, by and large, is borne by the jobless—we must not forget that; but I suggest that this method of spreading it over 1,800,000 people, rather than the 230,000 that will be cut off today, is more equitable than the measures proposed in this bill. I think that this proposal of mine will give further consideration to regional disparities, which we are so concerned about, and at the same time will work in the direction of decreasing the work disincentives that were built into the 1971 act. I want to tell honourable senators that even if Bill C-14 were passed with all my amendments included—and there may be other and better ones in the bushes, for all I know—I, for one, should not be satisfied because what we need is a thorough reworking of our unemployment insurance policy. We need to isolate and restructure the insurance elements of that plan. We need to separate and identify what transfer and welfare elements we propose to adopt in such a plan. Above all, we need to design a system that is financially sound and socially just; an income protection plan that helps those that are entitled to it, that is designed to work against misuse and abuse, but avoids penalizing those who need the help the measure can provide. In my opinion, Bill C-14 does very little in any of these directions. At best it is a temporary piece of ad hoc-ery, and I suggest that this is a challenge the Senate of Canada might well accept.

After this bill is disposed of we might give some thought to arranging for one of our committees to accept that challenge, a challenge to help the workers, to help the employed and the unemployed alike, and to get a policy in the unemployment realm that is suitable for the needs of the people and the economy. I think the Senate could well help design a plan that the whole nation could be proud of.

Meanwhile, I hope that this bill will go to committee. The honourable gentleman who moved second reading indicated he was not disposed to do this, but I ask him to give some consideration to this suggestion. I do not mind whether the committee chosen is the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science or the Committee of the Whole, but I think the bill should go to committee. There are points that should be elucidated, as far as I am concerned. Not all of us had the privilege of attending the committee, and it seems to me that if we are going to introduce our amendments, the committee stage is the best place to start them rolling. We have there an opportunity to give the full reasoning behind them, and an opportunity to discharge our obligations to the sponsor of the bill to deal with the finances of the matter, as he requested and as I am prepared to do. In other words, this would give us the opportunity to conduct ourselves in the usual way in which we deal with bills after second reading.

I guess the bill is going to pass, either in the Committee of the Whole or some other committee of the house, so with that request to the honourable sponsor that we should proceed to committee as the next stage, I take my seat.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (1915)

At 7.35 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I have been in somewhat of a quandary this evening because of the very able arguments presented by my colleague, Senator Roblin.

Senator Forsey: Is Senator Lang closing the debate?

Senator Lang: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the Honourable Senator Lang closing the debate or only answering a question?

Senator Lang: I am closing the debate.

Senator Forsey: Do not close the debate yet. I defer to Senator Marshall.

Senator Marshall: There was agreement at 6 o'clock this evening that Senator Roblin would be able to continue until 6.10 p.m. and that there was no need to adjourn the debate.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to participate in this debate and to follow my distinguished colleague, Senator Roblin.

Does Senator Benidickson have a question?

Senator Benidickson: What are we proceeding on?

Hon. Jack Marshall: We are proceeding with the debate on the second reading of Bill C-14.

I repeat that I am pleased to follow my distinguished colleague, Senator Roblin, who covered, in glowing terms, all the points in the bill. I should also like to commend Senator Lang. I can understand the dilemma that he has, the government has and, indeed, the Minister of Employment and Immigration must have who, I am sure, as a humane Canadian, recognizes the difficulty of introducing a bill of this kind that affects so many people in isolated areas across Canada.

I understand that when Senator Bonnell spoke at the committee stage, he indicated that the minister was sympathetic to the original proposal with respect to repeating claimants. It had been contemplated that if an individual drew 26 weeks of benefits, he or she would have to work the same number of weeks in order to establish a new claim. After hearing representations from many sources, especially those from the Atlantic provinces, the government made two significant changes to the definition of "repeaters" so that this provision will now create less hardship in those regions of Canada where jobs are harder to find and there is high unemployment.

Moreover, to take account of important regional disparities, the bill now proposes that the repeaters provision will not apply in any region of Canada where the applicable regional unemployment is over 11.5 per cent. So far as my province of Newfoundland is concerned, I only wish we had that rate of unemployment because it is more like 16.8 per cent.

Honourable senators, knowing the exorbitant amount of money that has to be spent on unemployment insurance, I can understand the government's dilemma. However, it is obvious to me that it will create hardship not only to people in eastern Canada and Newfoundland, which I represent, but also to people across the country who live in areas that are out of the mainstream of economic development and where unemployment is high. In the central parts of Canada where economic development is taking place, the employment rate is good.

I want to apologize to Senator Bonnell that, as a member of the committee, I was unable to attend the six or seven meetings that the committee held. My absence was only because we on this side of the house are so few in number that we must have an order of priorities to enable us to carry out our responsibilities.

Senator Connolly explained the purpose of referring the subject matter of a bill to a Senate committee. I appreciated his remarks. This formula for pre-studying legislation before it is formally introduced in the Senate is particularly useful when you are dealing with a complicated bill such as Bill C-14, which has been under consideration in the House of Commons for two months now.

At the committee meeting that I did attend we had as witnesses representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress, and two paragraphs from their representation put into perspective in a few words what the bill is all about. They said:

Bill C-14, in our view, brings this six-year charade to the point where the whole fabric of our unemployment insurance legislation is threatened with destruction as a social insurance program. Indeed, we are rapidly approaching its substitution by a means-tested welfare program under which Canadian citizens will no longer be eligible for jobless benefits as a matter of right, but will have to meet a mixed bag of employment durations and earnings criteria that emphasize a cost benefit ratio formula as the focal point of eligibility.

This scenario is contoured in Bill C-14 where it seeks to categorize claimants into new entrants, re-entrants and repeaters; sets up 20 hours per week and 30 per cent of maximum weekly insurable earnings as minimum criteria for coverage; increases basic entrance requirements, establishes retroactively a straight reduction in the level of benefits; triples the number of regions for the purpose of calculating percentages of unemployment, and introduces a direct form of discriminatory taxation to recover a percentage of benefits already paid and already taxed. All these provisions are aimed at reducing the government's share of the bill for 8 per cent or higher unemployment in the work force to give plausibility to its misdirected program of restraint. In doing so it exhibits a callous disregard for the eventual fate of the unemployment insurance program and that of the people who need its benefits most to survive in the world of work where there are few, if any, jobs to be found. It also tends to discriminate against women workers and young work seekers.

The effect on women was expertly explained by Senator Bird yesterday, for which she should be commended.

I indicated that this bill creates hardships in the part of the country I come from. I am sure the minister sympathizes. That has to do with the Atlantic provinces, parts of Quebec, and many other parts of the country. It affects especially the five eastern provinces, in which, through no fault of their own, because of the economic situation, potential workers are exposed to periodic and genuinely involuntary unemployment. In the regions of high unemployment this bill will represent a substantial burden on people who are unemployed through no fault of their own.

One factor of the program, the 20-week provision, is difficult to comprehend. There is no possible way that people in Newfoundland could comply with this provision, whereby the entry or re-entry of a claimant will require 20 weeks of contributions. By definition that eliminates the seasonal worker. Whether he happens to be from Newfoundland—the seasonal fisherman, such as a lobster fisherman—whether he happens to be from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, it will be difficult for anyone to comply.

Over the years we have had the experience of this, even in the last bill.

The minister accepted the recommended changes by members from the eastern provinces when the bill was amended last year to provide for a regional factor built into the qualifying period so that people in Newfoundland would not have to work as long to qualify for benefits as those in places like Alberta.

• (1925)

Take the lobster fishermen in Newfoundland, for example. The season runs from April to July.

Senator Riley: In some areas.

Senator Marshall: Yes, in some areas. I stand corrected by Senator Riley because in Prince Edward Island and in Nova Scotia the seasons are different. But in Newfoundland, there are some seasons when the fishermen never get their traps into the water because of ice conditions or of poor weather.

Tourism is another industry that employs seasonal workers. Incidentally, through the good offices of the government, my district on the west coast of Newfoundland has one of the finest national parks ever created, the Gros Morne Park. Those who are lucky enough to get employment there find it difficult to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits because they only work during a short season. The last statistics that I am aware of show that there are 34,000 unemployed in my province, plus another 13,000 who are not even registered at the Manpower Offices, representing 45 per cent of the people looking for work.

Senator Thompson said that some of the money that will be saved as a result of this bill will go into training programs. Senator Roblin explained how these programs work. They operate on a national basis and are not geared to suit particular regions.

Senator Thompson: That is not correct.

Senator Bosa: That is not correct.

Senator Thompson: Senator Marshall, I suggest to you that you have in Newfoundland, as was mentioned when the committee met, LEDA, which is one of the programs given. Admittedly, it is not specifically on training, but it is the local employment development program, and the department told us that they are tailoring these programs specifically to meet local needs and local initiatives.

It may be logical, for example, to have a training school in Alberta for welders required to work on the Northern pipeline.

Senator Marshall: The LEDA program has just been introduced. To give an example, the community employment strategy program just introduced in the Port au Port area, which is in my district, was directed in the right way, but the government, in its wisdom, decided to cancel it.

It is significant that on this very day the Premier of Newfoundland is in the town of Stephenville to explain the details of the purchase of the Labrador Linerboard Mill, where some 1,100 people were put out of work because of the closure. I can indeed commend the federal government and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for providing $13.5 million to help Abitibi Price reactivate the mill and to change its operation from manufacturing linerboard to manufacturing paper, thus providing employment for some 650 people.

The government does not seem to realize, as they did not realize when the Labrador Linerboard Mill started three or four years ago, that any industry helped by government is supposed to provide employment in the area. They always forget the basic fact that people have to be trained.

• (1930)

Senator Thompson said that the federal government will provide $300 million for Newfoundland's retraining programs. They provided $400 million in the past, but still the unemployment level is 16.8 per cent. For example, we have enough tractor operators and truckers trained in Newfoundland to supply all of Canada. That is not what we need at the present time. We need to have our people retrained so that they can get jobs in this new mill, for which we are thankful.

Senator McElman: Will the honourable senator permit a question at this time?

Senator Marshall: Yes.

Senator McElman: Is it not the responsibility of the province to determine what training will suit the purpose of the province?

Senator Marshall: That is right. It is done in consultation with the federal government. The federal government has been very helpful in the past in trying to provide jobs. However, I do not want to take anything away from the provincial government for not letting the Labrador Linerboard Mill Ltd. go down. The revitalization of the mill will be a boost to the west coast of Newfoundland but, I say, too, that along with the fact that the government is providing $13.5 million in financial assistance to the purchase of the mill with the province, the government has to realize that rather than sending Newfoundlanders out of the province they should keep them in Newfoundland and put them in on-the-job training programs so that they can take the jobs offered in their own area.

That does not get away from the fact that Newfoundland is in a dilemma with regard to this bill. One of the difficulties we shall experience is that people will be taken off the unemployment insurance rolls. The province will be financially burdened when these people have to receive social assistance. I spoke to one of the officials of the Department of Social Assistance in Newfoundland today. He told me that last year, while people were going through this waiting period, there were 1,500 people with less than 20 weeks of stamps, and they had to apply for social assistance and were given that under the condition that they repay it when they received their unemployment insurance benefits. However, they never did qualify for that. The reduction will mean a loss of $4.7 million for the first fiscal year, $8.3 million in the next year, and it will increase from there.

Last year there were 4,000 able bodied relief recipients in Newfoundland. According to the figures I was given today, that will double next year because of the changes that will occur as a result of Bill C-14. I can only say—and I do not want to belabour the point that Senator Roblin made—that the simple solution would have been to accept the province's proposal, whereby those who do not have dependants will get the lesser rate of 50 per cent, and maintain the figure of 66½ per cent for those who have dependants and who need it most. As I said, Senator Roblin gave us those figures. It appears that when anyone comes up with some commonsense amendments, the government rejects them. Indeed, under the proposed amendment the government would save more than $800 million or $900 million.

I hope honourable senators in their wisdom will consider the amendment to be proposed by Senator Roblin. I know we will be able to impress upon the minister that the amendment would result in greater benefit for the people of Canada.

I wish to emphasize again the hardships that people in high unemployment regions will suffer as a result of this measure. I know the minister is sympathetic, and I feel certain that we in our wisdom can convince him as to the merits of the amendment.

We have recently experienced once again the recurring disease of anti-sealers. The sealers in the remote areas of Newfoundland often require the time over which the seal hunt takes place in order to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. Also ignored in the whole controversy of the seal hunt is the fact the seal meat provides these people with a high protein food source.

In summary Senator Roblin's proposed amendment would improve the bill for the greatest benefit of all Canadians and achieve the desired savings under the government's restraint program.

Senator Thompson: I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator a question. I am wondering whether he can tell us offhand the number of young people and women that would be affected in his province as a result of the proposed reduction in benefits.

Senator Marshall: I do not have those figures at hand. It may be that Senator Roblin has a province-by-province breakdown. It may be possible to provide the honourable senator with those figures during committee consideration of the bill.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, it is difficult for me to take a conflicting view on an unemployment insurance bill. It has been said that this bill will be ineffectual. One who has made that allegation is my honourable friend from Newfoundland, Senator Marshall. One of the great breakthroughs in this insurance bill has as its purpose the benefit of fishermen in the Atlantic provinces, and from the point of view of its sagacity and its sureness it can be considered a great breakthrough. I am sure it will be to the advantage of his friends. It met with my approval—because I was here—particularly insofar as the insurance feature of it was concerned. But there have been many other breakthroughs.

● (1940)

I am surprised at my friend, the former Premier of Manitoba, from the Conservative Party of that province, wondering if perhaps this bill is too restrictive and too unhelpful to the beneficiaries of the insurance plan. I hope he has explained that, and I hope he will explain it in Manitoba where he is highly respected. But we have heard, after certain very, shall I say, small "1" liberal amendments to the important legislation introduced by my good friend, the Honourable Bryce Mackasey in 1971, friends of my colleague, Senator Roblin, who were very much opposed. Some of those were what I call liberalized improvements beneficial to the recipients under that statute and that legislation. So I don't know what our trouble is in a practical way. We have tonight, just before Christmas—and I do not want to be political—three colleagues who would support my good friend, ex-Premier Roblin, and in the official opposition we have a great number of others. Not that it is not normal that we have a disproportionate distribution here at times, but here we are. We had an amendment a little earlier, as I understood it, asking that we discuss this after Christmas. Now, is it reasonable that this should be done? Was it unreasonable that we voted it down, when we have on this side 40 as against three on the opposite side?

● (1945)

I think there is a heart and a feeling and an understanding for legislation on the part of all members of this chamber as well as on the part of the members of the other chamber, and I, as a long-time independent Liberal labour representative, both in the other place and here, feel sensitive to this kind of legislation and debate. Nevertheless, we have to be realistic. We have to look at the facts.

I must say that I was a bit hesitant to speak on this matter, having noted that Senator Roblin, who spoke so eloquently, had the benefit this afternoon and this evening of the advice and counsel of our distinguished friend Senator Forsey, who likewise gave good counsel to the Canadian Labour Congress. I am sure Senator Roblin and Senator Forsey have many matters in common with respect to this bill, and I find that food for thought. It makes me wonder whether those who are to benefit under the legislation are properly represented here tonight; indeed, it makes me wonder whether I am deficient in that respect and am not representing them. But I wish to state clearly that I am quite prepared to meet after Christmas. Of course, I did vote against an amendment the purpose of which was to have further discussion after the Christmas recess, but when I look around and see so many others opposed to it—responsible senators and legislators, persons sympathetic to all responsible senators and legislators, persons sympathetic to all concerned in this important piece of legislation, others who like myself in 1971 supported Mr. Mackasey's proposals, which were then voted down to an extent by the people of Canada because they obviously required some rectification and improvement—I am not satisfied that we are not doing our duty if we dispose of this legislation tonight, especially as I know that Senator Bonnell's committee dealt with it both extensively and intensively over many, many meetings.

● (1950)

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, I must apologize, first of all, for taking up the time of the Senate at this late hour—not late in the evening, but late in the period before the recess—to what I fear some may regard as an undue degree. My excuse for doing so is that I think I am the only person present tonight who for 27 years was closely associated as an official, first of the Canadian Congress of Labour and then of the Canadian Labour Congress, with the people who are most directly affected by this legislation, the working people of Canada; and for that reason I think that perhaps I bring to the consideration of this subject—

Senator Benidickson: Would the senator permit me to say that I would not accept that entirely. The unorganized labour people are very important and are not identified with—

Senator Forsey: All right. I accept that observation; but the fact remains that I think I am correct in saying I am the only person in this place tonight who for 27 years was an official of first the Canadian Congress of Labour and then the Canadian Labour Congress, who represent a considerable proportion of the workers of this country, certainly of the organized workers of this country; and that's my excuse for taking up perhaps more time than in other circumstances I should. Having said that—

Senator McElman: Would the honourable senator permit me to ask if he does not think that former premiers in this chamber and those who have been representing people of constituencies also represented very ably organized labour as well as others in the community?

Senator Forsey: What the honourable senator is saying is quite irrelevant to what I was saying. I repeat for the third time, honourable senators, that I am the only person here tonight who has been an official of the Canadian Congress of Labour and the Canadian Labour Congress for 27 years and that therefore I think I have a particular reason for speaking and a particular point of view to bring. There may be a dozen other people here—there can't be two dozen, because I don't think there are two dozen present—there may be a dozen other people here who have an equal right to speak on behalf of large segments of the population, perhaps a much larger segment than I have. I am not making any reflections upon anybody else or anybody else's title to speak, as representing any group of people they want to say they represent. If the Honourable Senator Roblin, for example, wants to say that he represents the entire population of Manitoba, one million people, and if the Honourable Senator Robichaud wants to say that he represents the whole population of New Brunswick, and that between them they represent more than all the labour congresses put together, I have not the slightest objection. But thanks to these interjections—which I think were entirely irrelevant to what I was trying to say—I have just taken up more time repeating what I said in the first place, and I just hope that I shall not have to engage in further repetitions of this kind simply because of irrelevant interjections.

Senator McElman: But the record is now clear.

Senator Forsey: I am sorry. I am not going to put this apparatus on for a while now because I want to get on with my speech instead of having to answer interjections which simply throw me off my train of thought, such as it is. The next thing I want to say—

Senator Riley: Is the honourable senator opposed to interjections?

Senator Forsey: I beg your pardon?

Senator Riley: Is the honourable senator opposed to interjections from the floor of this house?

Senator Forsey: No, I am not opposed to interjections, but I am not proposing to put this apparatus on, to overcome my infirmity, every time somebody gets up. If somebody wants to make an interjection, he will have to put up with not being answered necessarily at the time he makes it. I am sorry, but I don't want to spend the whole evening repeating, repeating and repeating something that I think is perfectly clear in the first place.

I was about to embark on some conciliatory remarks, but now I have become somewhat heated as a result of these interjections.

Senator McElman: I apologize—

Senator Forsey: Oh, heavens on earth. I never saw such a performance in my life. What is it now?

Senator McElman: I apologize for intervening. I did not wish to be discourteous to the honourable senator. I thought it was normal practice for all honourable senators to permit a question.

Senator Forsey: Perfectly normal practice, and I tried to answer; and then the same thing came up again, and I tried to answer again. I am not proposing to go through the rest of the evening answering something three or four times in succession, repeating the same thing three or four times in succession, and I am not proposing to have to sit down every two or three seconds because somebody jumps up to ask some question which may or may not be entirely relevant.

Now perhaps I could be allowed to make one or two conciliatory remarks. I want to make them because I shall probably be presenting observations that will be very distasteful to some of the members of the house. I want to say, first of all, that the government, in the present circumstances, faces a very difficult situation. So do all governments in the western world. I am very thankful indeed that I have no more responsibility in regard to public affairs than I have. I do not envy people in the cabinet. I do not envy even the leaders of the opposition in the tasks they have to perform. Fortunately, my task, such as it is, is a much more modest one. I am going to try, however, to fulfil it to the best of my ability.

The next thing I want to say is that I realize that the government is under very strong pressure to engage in restraint, and that there are solid reasons for that. I am not sure that the measures of restraint that have been embarked upon are invariably well considered. I am not sure that other measures could not be taken which would be more effective in stimulating economic growth, which seems to me to be one of the most necessary things in this country at present.

I am not much impressed, for example, by the cuts in the Public Service of Canada, or by the way they have been undertaken, and this is a subject on which I hope to deliver my soul at some length and with some vigour on another and more appropriate occasion. I am not certain that some of the revenue that is needed to meet the large government deficits could not be recovered by getting at the large amounts of deferred taxes which certain corporations, large and by no means poverty-stricken corporations, owe to the people of this country. I am not altogether sure, either, that the savings which were supposed to result from this particular measure will be quite as large as is suggested, because, if I understand the government's proposals correctly, a certain amount of the money to be saved is to be used in employment-creating programs. I am delighted to hear that the money is to be used for employment-creating programs. I only hope however, that it will get through to the people who need it most. I am a little inclined to think that some of it may be lost in bogs and sands, and that some of it may not get to the people who need it most.

I am going to quote now—for the first time, since I shall be quoting later, on other specific matters—from a most interesting document published by the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto in October last. It is entitled "Policy Statement: The problem is jobs . . . not people: A response to proposed provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act by the Government of Canada." In a few respects this document is slightly out of date because some changes have been made in the program since it was drafted, but this particular quotation from it, I think, is not out of date by any means. It is:

A stated justification for a reduction of Unemployment Insurance benefits is to finance a job creation effort from the money saved. There is no guarantee that those who will suffer a reduction in benefits will be the ones to acquire jobs, nor is there any guarantee of a sufficient number of jobs.

This sums up an uneasiness and a disquietude that I feel on this subject.

Before going on to consider the bill specifically, I should like to say one or two things about some of the contributions that have been made so far to the debate this afternoon—or technically to a previous debate, in some instances—on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, and notably a couple of remarks made by Senator Thompson. We heard from Senator Thompson what I thought was a most excellent speech, very well thought out and very well expressed, as is the case with all his speeches. This one, however, I thought, was particularly notable.

I was very much inclined to agree with nearly all that he said about, for example, the present Unemployment Insurance Act being outmoded legislation; about fundamental changes taking place in society; and about the necessity of having fundamental changes in our social security system accordingly. As I listened to him, I thought to myself, well, that's very nice, but as he, in effect, admitted, this bill is not it. This bill does not meet the needs of which he was speaking. I entirely endorse his suggestion that it would be a very good idea for the Senate to set up a committee or ask one of its standing committees to investigate the whole question of social security or at least of unemployment insurance in this country. I think, in effect, that Senator Thompson was not giving very high marks to this legislation when he was talking about the need for something very fundamental.

There is one other remark of Senator Thompson's I would like to comment on. He spoke with approval, as I understood him, of the re-amalgamation of the manpower and unemployment insurance offices or the bringing of them once again under one roof. He remarked, perhaps a trifle facetiously—I hope that was it—that under the new dispensation, or the restored old dispensation, it was possible for an unemployment insurance claimant to make his claim and then to be told, and I have his words down exactly, "Go down to the next room and get a job." When I heard that, I said to Senator Roblin sotto voce, "I would like to find that room; it must be a magical room". I think there are a great many people in this country now on unemployment insurance, or off it because they have exhausted their benefits, who would be very interested in finding that room down the hall from the unemployment insurance offices, where they can get a job.

To come to the bill itself and to certain connected considerations, I heartily agree with the excellent speech which we have just heard from Senator Marshall. As an expatriate Newfoundlander, I was particularly struck and particularly moved by what he said about those in my native province. I shan't attempt to embroider on what he said; that would indeed be painting the lily and gilding refined gold.

I was also, of course, greatly impressed by what Senator Roblin said although, in certain matters, I find myself not in agreement with him, as will become evident as I go on.

I think the 1971 Unemployment Insurance Act was a good act. I do not feel there is any apology to be made for its provisions. I think it is unfortunate that so many of those provisions are now being undermined or destroyed or whittled down—choose your own metaphor.

I am appalled that this legislation was introduced without any kind of consultation with the people most affected, whether employers or employed; and if anybody thinks I am exag-gerating there, I can say that I questioned, at the one meeting of Senator Bonnell's committee which I attended—many of the meetings took place at hours when I was chairing another committee—I particularly asked the representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress if they had been consulted. I asked them twice very specifically, and they said flatly that they had not. I said, "What has become of the old unemployment insurance advisory committee?" They replied, "Oh, it's dead, but under the new act passed in 1977 there was provision for an advisory council." I further asked, "Well, has it been appointed yet?" Their reply was, "No, it has not."

It was explained to us by the representatives of the department that it was very difficult to get these things going. First of all, they would have to find somebody to chair some kind of strategy committee or selection committee which would decide how the council would be made up, and then they would have to find other members of this committee. Then they had to find "the time and the place and the loved one all together," where this committee could meet. Then the committee had to advise them on who they should consult, who they should put on the council, and I think we were told that on November 18, if I remember correctly, a letter had gone out to the Canadian Labour Congress inviting it to appoint its representative on this new council, and the Congress, we were told, had not replied. It seems quite clear that there was no proper consultation, and, as far as I can discover, no consultation with the employers' side either.

It is all very well to say they were able to come before a committee afterwards and put in their two-pennyworth. But this is a quite different thing. If you come before a committee with a piece of legislation before you and start to explain why you think this particular clause is ill-drafted and that clause will have bad effects, you run up against a sort of amour propre in the government and in the officials, who naturally are prejudiced in favour of the work of their own hands and their own minds, and are rather reluctant, in many instances—and understandably so—to make changes. Whereas, if there is prior consultation and you put merely a draft before them confidentially and say, "What do you think of that?" then the representatives of the unions or the employers say, "Don't you realize what the consequences of that would be? It would get you into the most unholy mess, for this reason, this reason and this reason." The minister and the officials may then be inclined to say, "We hadn't thought of that. We will take another look at it," and they may then perhaps be prepared to make changes. If you come to them in public before a committee and suggest the same sort of thing, your chances of getting changes are, I think, almost certainly much diminished.

In any case, there always used to be, on changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, consultation with an official Unemployment Insurance Advisory Committee provided for in the act. In this case there was no such committee in being, and there appears to have been no informal consultation, which would have been perfectly possible, even though the council had not been set up.

It seems to me that it would have been good sense to have that prior consultation. It would have been justice, and it would have been a signal example of working participatory democracy, of which we used to hear a good deal. Instead of that we seem to have got a piece of slapdash legislation. I shan't use some stronger language, which I think was used by a previous speaker. I shall merely confine myself to the colloquialism of saying that it seems to me it is slapdash legislation.

I may also remark that the result is one which seems to have a great many of what I would call the wrong friends—the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Construction Association and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. Now, I don't say they are not entitled to their point of view, but as an old labour man, when I find those people all lined up ranged behind a particular program I am inclined to be very suspicious; I am inclined to feel that the program—

Senator Frith: They always speak very highly of you, sir.

Senator Forsey: That shows their kindness of heart rather than their good judgment. Anyway, I feel uneasy when I find what seem to me to be the wrong people so enthusiastic about a measure of this sort, which I think will unquestionably work a great deal of hardship on many unfortunate people.

The next thing I want to mention is this talk about a pure insurance program and a welfare program. Well, I suppose you can ring the changes on that indefinitely, but I don't think that anybody actually is proposing a pure insurance program. It seems to me that the bill itself has a number of welfare elements in it. It doesn't seem to me that any of the suggestions that have so far been made for amendments would be free of the same objection. I think there is a great deal to be said for the amendment which I gather Senator Roblin intends to propose, restoring the present rate for unemployed people with dependants, and cutting the rate to 50 per cent of insured earnings for single persons.

But it does not seem to me that you can absolve that proposal of the charge of being a mixture of insurance and welfare and so if somebody says to me, "We must get this thing back to purely insurance principles," my answer is, "Well, I don't see any sign that that is coming," unless we get this massive, global re-working of the whole thing suggested by Senator Thompson. It certainly does not seem to be proposed by anybody on either side of politics at present and there is a certain inconsistency in most of the arguments that are made on that point.

Now then we get all this about the abuses under the act. Well, I fail to see that there is anything in this legislation which really deals with the abuses. No doubt there are abuses. There are abuses of everything you can think of. There are even abuses connected with the Senate, as all of us are aware. Some of us are getting uneasy about some of these things. But I can't see anything in this bill that really deals with them. Most of the abuses, I suspect, can be dealt with and in fact are being dealt with by stringent administrative methods and there is something in this Social Planning Council report on the subject which suggests that they are being dealt with in a more than severe method, in a very harsh fashion and that in fact that people are being almost victimized by some of the officials in the way that they go after them.

If anybody wants me to produce evidence, I can hunt for a moment or two and find it here.

I might add that when I am quoting the Social Planning Council of Toronto, Metropolitan Toronto, I feel that I am quoting a fairly respectable body. I am not producing something sponsored by the Communist Party of Canada, official on the one hand or Marxist-Leninist on the other. I think the people on the Social Planning Council of Toronto are people of knowledge, experience and capacity and, as far as I know, they are not even supporters of the New Democratic Party, let alone revolutionaries.

I think perhaps I can find that passage here—I see I have marked the page—the passage in which they speak of the administrative measures which have already been taken and which perhaps not everybody realizes have been taken. A great deal of this talk of abuses is, I think, talk—gossip—and it gets reflected in the various polls. I am not profoundly impressed always by the validity of these polls and I suspect that if you ask people some of the questions that are asked, “Do you think people are cheating on unemployment insurance?” or something of that sort, it is very much like saying, “Do you think there are people who are doing wrong?” The answer is, “Yes, of course there are.” If you went around and said to most of the people of Canada, “Do you think the people of Canada sin?” the answer would probably be, by an overwhelming majority, “Yes.” But it does not follow that the whole population is made up of Hitlers or Bluebeards or Jack-the-Rippers. I am not much impressed by that.

The report says:

Furthermore there is reason to believe that the administrative procedures used by the Unemployment Insurance Commission are not only becoming tighter, but may have overstepped acceptable limits to public involvement in the lives of individuals. Benefit control procedures appear to be arbitrary and based on a general mistrust of recipients. Procedures that do not fully reveal regulations to recipients, the designation of high abuse categories, trick questions, intimidation tactics, and unofficial cut-off quotas are all inconsistent with a democratic society and the maintenance of basic human rights.

I don't necessarily subscribe to that. I simply say this is the report of people who presumably are in the position to know something about the way the administration of the legislation is handled in a relatively prosperous area like Toronto, and if this should be done in the green tree what shall be done in the dry? If there are difficulties of anything like that sort, even discounted by 50 per cent in an area like Toronto, I suspect an even greater proportion in other parts of the country where the unemployment situation is worse.

● (2015)

I want to make it quite clear at this point that I am opposed to this bill lock, stock, and barrel. I am anxious to do everything I can to delay its coming into effect. I make no apology for that whatever. I think it is bad legislation. I think it is cruel legislation. That is a harsh word to use. I don't mean to imply that the people responsible for it are cruel. I simply say that I think the effect of it is cruel.

I think it is a very inappropriate piece of legislation to bring on at this season of the year. We heard a good deal yesterday about the Christmas spirit. Well, if this is an example of the Christmas spirit, I should prefer to be excused and have the spirit of some other time of the year.

There are a number of specific points in the bill which I think need to be emphasized once again, and I shall be able to do so in most instances very briefly, because they have already been dealt with adequately by previous speakers. But I do want to say again that the bill would work great hardship on part-time employees, and especially women. I entirely ascribe to everything Senator Bird said on this subject. Indeed, I think I could take from this document that I have been quoting a variety of statements and statistics to show that Senator Bird put the matter very moderately indeed.

I think there is no question also that the cut from 66½ per cent of insurable earnings to 60 per cent will work enormous hardship, and comes at a peculiarly inappropriate time when the cost of living is rising every single month. This is going to work terrible hardship on many people. It is going to work terrible hardship on families; it is going to work particularly severe hardship, of course, on people from the disadvantaged areas of the country, such as the Atlantic provinces or eastern Quebec.

I want to say something more specifically about some of the things that are brought out in this report on the situation in Toronto. We are used to hearing about the Atlantic provinces; we are used to hearing about eastern Quebec; and we are used to hearing about particular regions in the Atlantic provinces such as Cape Breton or northeastern New Brunswick.

I was, frankly, profoundly shocked, startled, appalled to find in here the latest figures—or pretty well the latest figures; I think the latest ones they quote are from August last—on the situation in Toronto. Toronto is a place that some of us are inclined to think is in the banana belt climatically, and in the golden horseshoe economically. But, as they point out here, if you take Metro Toronto you had, in August 1978, 95,000 unemployed as against about 100,000 in the whole province of British Columbia. If you take the March figures, you will find that the Metro Toronto figure was just below the British Columbia figure, and about double the whole province of Alberta, more than double Nova Scotia, more than double New Brunswick, and they go on and on. There is a long list of figures there which I shan't quote. One has to have some kind of mercy on the Senate. If I went on as I intended to go on quoting chapter and verse, I might be accused of subjecting my colleagues to cruel and unusual punishment.

The situation there is a very serious one. Again, I am inclined to say if it is so bad in Toronto, I have every reason to think it is very much worse in all other parts of the country.

I am tempted to go on and deal with a number of other matters, but I think I shall, in charity to my colleagues, make just one other point, and I do so with great emphasis.

In this same document, pages 20 to 25, there is reference to the contradiction between the policy embodied in this bill and the policy embodied in the bill dealing with child benefits, which we passed enthusiastically. They have a good deal to say, and in detail, about the effect of this on those unemployed who have families. In fact, they quantify it. They give figures on the subject which, to my mind, are perfectly appalling. They give figure after figure to show that the net result of the two pieces of legislation, taken together, will actually be to decrease the funds available to the unemployed with families.

That, of course, will be covered, to some extent, by Senator Roblin's proposed amendment. I am a little dubious about the part of that which would reduce the benefits to single unemployed. But I think it will be a vast improvement over what we have here. I must admit that the fact that it is unanimously supported by the governments of the provinces, including, if I understood Senator Roblin correctly, the NDP Government of Saskatchewan, carries with me a good deal of weight. The contradiction between this niggardly, penny-pinching, miserly legislation and the child benefits legislation which we passed recently, seems to me very sad—indeed, tragic—and very depressing.

I have merely skimmed the surface of this legislation, honourable senators. Had it come to us in the ordinary way, with ample time to discuss it, I should have prepared myself much more thoroughly than I have done, and I should have been inclined to speak at much greater length, setting forth a long catalogue of the deficiencies in this bill and the necessity of at least making a number of amendments to it.

I shall myself, if I can find a seconder, and if, as the Quakers say, "way opens", have four amendments to propose. There is one other which I would like to propose, only I am afraid it would be out of order. I will make some reference to it when we come to the stage at which amendments are possible just before I propose, or attempt to propose, a particular amendment to the clause in question.

I think I had better defer any further comments until we get to the stage where amendments are possible.

Senator Thompson: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question.

Senator Forsey: Certainly.

Senator Thompson: The honourable senator made reference to a document of the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Council in which there was reference to the manner in which departmental officials in the city of Toronto investigate claims for possible abuses. He is aware, of course, that all claimants have the right of appeal in respect of the decision of the benefits officer.

I have no great love for bureaucracy, but I must say that I do admire very much the approach that has been taken by the departmental officials in Toronto in administering the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have not come across any evidence of a harsh investigatory approach.

In light of what was quoted from the document of the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Council, I am wondering if Senator Forsey would ask that body to forward to the department particulars of any specific cases of abuse of which they are aware. I am simply saying that I wish the honourable senator, having quoted from the statement of the Toronto Social Planning Council, would ask them if they would send to the department details of specific cases that they know of. I know, from having sat on the committee, the department would move very quickly, as would the minister, to take to task anybody who is arrogant and intimidating in trying to find out if a claimant is cheating the system.

Senator Forsey: Thank you, Senator Thompson; that is an excellent suggestion and I shall certainly take it up. I was careful to say that I did not necessarily share that; I was simply giving the evidence of people who presumably have certain experience. Evidently Senator Thompson has had quite a difference experience, and I am delighted to hear it.

I presume there is some kind of evidence for this or they would not have said it, and I merely quoted it in order to emphasize that I think very strong measures have been taken by the officials, and properly taken, to get rid of abuses. Parenthetically I might remark that I do not think the horror figures from the Auditor General are really relevant because I don't think that was a case of the wretched recipients overstepping the line; I think it was probably the infernal computers making a mess of things.

Senator Thompson: In replying to your point, senator, in the committee it was brought to our attention by the departmental officials that there are many reasons for the overpayments, including computer errors, and the Auditor General had made a number of suggestions for internal scrutiny and better quality control, and so on, which I understand the department is now putting into practice.

Senator McElman: The honourable senator mentioned in his remarks that his attendance at another committee prevented him from attending meetings of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee at which we heard many witnesses, including tremendous testimony from first-class civil servants, testimony that really answered some of the questions he has now raised. What committee was it that prevented him from attending those meetings?

Senator Forsey: To the best of my recollection, on occasions the meetings conflicted with meetings of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments—and it is my recollection which may be at fault—and on other occasions they conflicted with meetings of the Constitution Committee. I know there were a number of times when I wanted to get to this committee, of which I am not a member, and it seemed to

Senator McElman: I would not under any circumstances subscribe to the last words of the honourable senator. I have too much respect for him for that. But, as he knows, I am rather analytical in such things and I took the occasion, since he mentioned that it was a committee that he was chairing, to check very carefully, and the committee that he was chairing was not in conflict with the committee that studied this bill and heard such excellent testimony from senior bureaucrats or first-class witnesses before that committee. But I do agree that he was able to attend on that one occasion when the Canadian Labour Congress was there.

Senator Forsey: I fully subscribe to what the honourable senator says about the first-class officials, judging by what I saw that day, and I am sure they were equally good on other occasions. I was very much impressed by it.

● (2030)

I think it is quite evident from what Senator McElman has said that the Senate should take with a grain of salt various statements I have made, and follow Senator McElman's example and check on them very carefully. My colleagues would then be in a position to downgrade markedly the kind words they have said about me on various occasions, and that would be very good for my soul.

Senator McElman: May I simply add in the best of humour, senator, that, in addition to the grain of salt, I enjoyed the pepper with which you delivered your remarks.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to remind honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Lang speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I find it a difficult chore to close this debate. I was particularly impressed by Senator Roblin's presentation, and I am always impressed by Senator Forsey's. I can take neither of them lightly. I am really, in a way, being escorted tonight by the "ghost of Christmas yet to come." It is a rather dismal graveyard that those on the other side are pointing to, but I really think they are overstating the facts in their descriptions of this bill.

First of all, I think we have to be realistic and recognize that Canada is facing a current account deficit of something like $12 billion. That is fundamental to everything that is being done here. Certainly, if we try to rectify this situation we will undoubtedly produce legislation that will deprive people of certain government-provided benefits. Well, if we are mature people, we will do it; if we are not mature, then we will head for fiscal bankruptcy.

Senator Forsey called this cruel legislation. That statement is beyond my belief. What is cruel about it? The legislation is beneficial. He says it will have a bad effect on part-time workers and a serious impact on women. I don't think of women as other than persons. Yes, there will be certain persons affected who are part-time workers or women, but let us not exaggerate the impact of this legislation and paint it with such lurid colours as Senator Roblin and Senator Forsey would.

This is reasonable and, I suggest, honourable senators, humane legislation which is aimed, by means of its mechanisms, at avoiding the abuses that are now prevalent.

I have never had any particular sympathy for the policy of this government with respect to having consultation—or lack of consultation—with various interests before introducing legislation affecting them. In many ways that same lack of consultation preceded this legislation. But I should like to remind Senator Forsey that when the Anti-Inflation Act came into effect, the Canadian Labour Congress thereafter pulled out of all bodies in which it was involved with the federal government. If consultation is to have any meaning, it has to be two ways. I would like him to carry that message to them. They cannot have it, on the one hand, by withdrawal, and, on the other hand, complain that this government does not confer with them.

Honourable senators, we have had an argument tonight that the Unemployment Insurance Act should not be regarded as insurance. If the Unemployment Insurance Act is not to be insurance, let us be honest and say so; but if it is insurance, then let it be insurance. That leads me to one other point, which concerns the proposals inherent in Senator Roblin's remarks. If anyone goes out to buy life insurance, or fire insurance or income protection insurance, the premiums do not depend on how many children he has or whether he is married or unmarried. Anything that would bring in a two-tier system here would detract from the insurance concept and would, in effect, be the reverse of what Senator Roblin is, I think, trying to support.

What would be the economic impact of doing this? One might say that they did have it in the act before. I now propose to read from a script that I have:

The initial proposal put forward by the provinces, which is supported now by the Conservative Party, was to have a 50 per cent benefit rate for claimants without dependants and a 66⅔ benefit rate for claimants with dependants. The concept of dependants was not defined.

It was pointed out during committee hearings that the adoption of this proposal would have a serious discriminatory effect on women. If one were to use the definition of "dependants" as contained in the Unemployment Insurance Act before 1976, total savings with this approach would be about $850 million, which is comparable to the package contained in Bill C-14.

If one were restrictive and adopted, the provincial definition of "dependants"—that is, only dependant children—savings would be increased and discrimination towards women even more profound.

Using the former Unemployment Insurance definition of "dependants" the two-tier proposals could result in a situation whereby only 5 per cent of women would receive the highest benefit rate, whereas 42 per cent of men would be entitled to that rate.

In order to overcome the discriminatory effect on women, the Conservatives then proposed that either spouse can claim the children as dependants. In other words, there was no longer a differential benefit rate for those with or without dependants; but for those with or without children, whether or not they were really dependants, the use of this definition would overcome the discriminatory effect towards women, but would also reduce the savings by over $200 million.

Finally:

The Leader of the Opposition in the other place at the report stage introduced a motion that the Conservative two-tier proposal would use the same definition of "dependants" as contained in the Income Tax Act. This definition is very similar to that formerly used in the unemployment insurance program—that is, it would include dependant spouses as well as children.

What effect would this have? The Income Tax Act allows either spouse to claim the children as dependants. If this course were followed in such a way that whichever spouse was claiming unemployment insurance claimed the children as dependants, this would have the effect of reducing discrimination against women, but would reduce the savings under the program down to $638 million.

If in fact, as is presently the case, a spouse with the highest marginal tax rate continues to claim the children as dependants, then the savings would be in the order of $840 million, but the discrimination against women would continue to be profound.

In other words, my friends on the other side cannot have it both ways. In order to maintain the high level of savings the two-tier approach must discriminate against women. The removal of that discrimination implies a considerable loss—about $200 million—in the savings to the unemployment insurance program.

Now, honourable senators, I am not competent to deal with the technicalities of this thing, but I am sure that my friends on the other side are similarly incompetent to deal with these technicalities, and I think it would be presumptuous of them to try to press their suggestions tonight, if in fact they do so, with such lack of basic background knowledge, experience and technical data.

I am going to speak now to the question of whether this bill should be referred to a committee. I am opposed to this, for one reason. One of the most creative, innovative procedures that we have developed in the Senate has been the pre-study system that we started to use about five or six years ago. The whole purpose of the system is to avoid dilemmas such as that we find ourselves facing tonight. The Senate has done its committee work. It has studied the bill. Senator Bonnell has presided over a committee whose membership, I found, was more conversant with this piece of legislation than almost any other committee I have ever been with.

Senator Benidickson: Then let us applaud him for that.

Senator Lang: That committee has been sitting now for over three weeks. To refer this matter to a committee, or to a committee of this whole house, tonight, would abrogate the whole purpose, function and precedent we have established so laboriously over six years. If any motion is made tonight to make a mockery of the procedures developed by this chamber, by way of referring this bill to committee, I will strongly oppose it, and I hope most of my colleagues will support me. On the other hand, I hope that no one in this chamber will make that suggestion. It would be a redundancy, a mockery. It would destroy a system which we have developed, and which to date has been eminently successful and productive.

Honourable senators, let us not try to second guess the government on this bill. This is actually not a cruel bill; it is a humane bill. Its objective is to reduce the government's loss in the most humane way possible, and to create an incentive to work.

Let us not be dishonest with ourselves. A high proportion of Canadians today are poge artists, who live off this mechanism and who design their lifestyle around unemployment insurance. I think we have got to recognize that, and be quite honest about it. We have got to provide those people with real employment, reduce their dependency on unemployment insurance as a way of life, and lead them into creative and productive careers.

At this point in the evening I do not want to get into a comparison of the Canadian system with those of other countries. I will merely say that, by and large, our system in Canada is probably one of the most generous in the western world.

Honourable senators, when I wake up on the morning of the Christmas soon to come, and look out the window, I will say: God bless you every one.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this bill be now read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Forsey: No.

Senator Roblin: Madam Speaker, I ask for a recorded vote.
And more than two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

THE HONOURABLE SENATOR

Forsey—1.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be now read a third time.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, is the mover of the motion for third reading going to speak, or has he exhausted his repertoire on this occasion?

Senator Lang: I have not exhausted my repertoire, if you really want to bring me back into the act, but I do not choose to use it.

Senator Roblin: Then, honourable senators, perhaps I may be permitted to take part in the debate on third reading of the bill.

I want to start by expressing my very keen disappointment that my honourable friend has not agreed to send this bill, after second reading, to a committee. My preference being for Committee of the Whole. It seems to me that we are following a dangerous path if we accept his advice, because he told us that we do not need to send a bill to any committee after second reading, provided it has had prior consideration—a pre-study, as we call it—by some committee of this chamber.

[Senator Roblin.]

That is what I understood him to say, and I hope that I got the gist of his argument correctly. I must say that I find that a very dangerous argument indeed, because the fact of the matter is that the exception to the rule is to have the pre-study. That is the new idea. That is the new step that we are taking, with which, under certain circumstances, I have already stated that I heartily agree. I support most of what Senator Connolly had to say in that respect. But if we use it as a device for getting around too much of the regular procedure of this chamber, we are going to run into trouble.

Again I must defer to senior and possibly more experienced senatorial politicians than certainly I am, but I remember coming here and being quite struck with the fact that we did not make use of the Committee of the Whole very frequently. I think it has happened only once in my tenure here. I listened to the recommendation that if we had a select committee looking into the matter, it need not go to the Committee of the Whole. But there is a very dangerous lacuna—Senator Forsey, I hope I have that right—in the situation because, although all senators may attend special committees, it is by no means certain that all of them can. I do not think, for example, that anyone should be condemned if he is not a member of the committee and does not attend a meeting because, even though there may be other committees meeting at the same time, there are always lots of things to do. We should refrain from being unduly critical of any senator who does not attend a meeting of a committee that he is not a member of. In fact, I would not even criticize him if sometimes he does not attend a meeting of a committee that he is a member of, because things happen. The point is that only a certain few members are able to attend meetings of these select committees of the Senate.

The main purpose of Committee of the Whole is, of course, to give everybody, regardless of whether or not he or she is a member of a standing committee, a chance to have a go at the bill in detail. One of the main advantages of that procedure is that it gives a chance for a free exchange of information in respect of the measures that are before us.

When you come to third reading that is quite impossible. I can only speak once. I could not reply to some suggestions that my honourable friend the sponsor made on second reading, because it is out of order to do so. Any contribution I make on third reading, I have to make all in one piece and then sit down—I have had my say. If we are in Committee of the Whole, it is much different. At that time there is no limit to the number of interventions that a senator may make, and it is possible to conduct a reasonable dialogue between people with different points of view, seeking to find the middle ground or, if that is impossible, seeking to verify the facts.

I will give you some examples of the kind of thing I am talking about. We have been challenged on this side of the house to say something about the arithmetic of the two-tier system and the other matters that go with it. I came prepared to do that.

I have in my hand a series of estimates which I submit are worth considering which set out how the finances of the PC two-tier plan works. It deals with the estimated impact of the two-tier plan on the basis of information tabled by the department on December 4, 1978. Secondly, it deals with the impact of the part-time workers' provision in our amendments to this bill. The source is the detailed impact study of November 9, adjusted to reflect lower benefit rates. This deals with the repayment provisions. Again, the source of those is given as the detailed impact study of November 9. It also deals with the increased disqualification of the quits, which we talked about in the other debate. They are detailed here, and the methods of calculating the amounts of money involved in all those are set out so that one can form a reasoned opinion as to the validity of the figures.

I must agree with anyone who says that they are estimates. The government's figures are also estimates. Nevertheless, these are fairly reasonable figures to go on.

If we were in Committee of the Whole, it would be quite possible for me to exchange views with any senator who would like to go into this matter. I could tell the Senate how these figures were arrived at. They show a total savings, after deducting the welfare impact on the provinces, of $1.54 million. Against that is the government plan of $935 million less the welfare impact, being $892 million, giving a difference of more than $162 million as between the plan I am proposing and the plan we have now.

Members of the Senate will have to take my word on these figures being relevant, because we will not have a chance to deal with them. I should like to ask, for example, about this $400 million which is being transferred to the provinces. What is the rationale of deciding on December 22, 1978 that an extended payment benefit—which has been deemed for five or six years to be a non-insured item, in the sense of its not being part of the insurance plan and, therefore, paid for by direct government payment—is now an insured item as opposed to what is an income transfer or welfare item and has been classified as such for the past few years? There must be a reason for that, and if we were in Committee of the Whole it might be explained to my satisfaction.

I should like to ask, for example, what would have happened to the insurance rates for the employees who contribute, and the employers who contribute, if they had not been asked to assume this new $400 million expense, which is now assigned to the insurance portion of the plan? Those kinds of questions might be revealing.

I was particularly struck—and I know one must not refer to debates on a previous subject, but if I phrase it carefully perhaps I can skate around that rule—to be told a few minutes ago that the two-tier principle is a departure from the insurance plan and would spoil the purity of the bill. Well, honourable senators, are we not aware that there are some 90,000 people already in the two-tier system in the government plan. Who are they? They are the people making more than $20,000 a year who will be asked to give back part of their insurance premiums.

There is no insurance principle that I can discern in that, and if you can swallow that I do not see why you cannot swallow a two-tier system that deals with people who have dependants and those who do not. It seems to me that, had we been in Committee of the Whole, these matters could be discussed.

I should like to examine with my honourable friend the point he raised about the effect of the two-tier plan on members of the female sex as opposed to the plan proposed in the bill. What is the impact of the bill on women and youth, and what is the impact under the two-tier program that I am sponsoring whereby these people would be put back on the rolls? I do not know whether it balances out, but it seems to me that there might be an element of some rough justice in there at any rate.

It would not serve the purposes of this house for me to detail on third reading the questions I should like to have asked had there been a Committee of the Whole stage. I should like to have gone through the whole bill from stem to stern. I should have liked to have examined the increased entrance requirements for program repeaters and for new entrants and re-entrants. I should like to have examined the change in the financing of the Labour Force Extended phase. I should like to have looked into the benefits rate change and what the implications of that are. I should like to have looked at the repayment of benefits for high income claimants. I should like to have had the increase in minimum weekly insurability explained.

Honourable senators opposite may say that I should have been at the Select Committee. It is not possible for all of us to be at the Select Committee, and I do not think it is a proper argument to make in any event. We have a procedure in the house by which these matters can be dealt with, that being a Committee of the Whole. Not so long ago we had the then Acting Minister of Labour, the Honourable André Ouellet, in the Senate, and he was able to give a good account of himself. I am sure the minister responsible for this bill, had he been here, would have given a good account of himself, and in fact he might have been able to deal in an authoritative manner with some of the views that I and other senators hold on this particular bill.

I am disappointed that it has not been thought fit to have the Committee of the Whole stage, or some committee stage, on this bill. It seems to me that committee consideration is part of the parliamentary procedure for a very good reason. It is not something that we should deliberately refrain from having, especially when requested, unless there is a very good reason to do so.

There are many pieces of legislation that come before this house for which Committee of the Whole consideration would be redundant, and we had an example of that this afternoon in the case of Bill C-34. I am sure honourable senators would approach this matter with a good deal of common sense. They are not going to insist on formal stages of a bill just for the sake of it, although in other bodies that certainly is done.

Common sense is one of the qualities one might attribute to the deliberations of this body.

I have been impressed, I must say, on how well we do without the rule book most of the time. We seem to get along remarkably well without reference to it. We even manage to settle some of the points of order without having to trouble Her Honour the Speaker. I, for one, am in favour of that. I rather enjoy that more relaxed atmosphere. But I regret that it was not seen fit to grant the request for Committee of the Whole consideration in this instance.

I have two amendments to move, honourable senators, one of which I shall ask Senator Marshall to move. I move:

That Bill C-14, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 15 to 20 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"24. (1) Subject to subsection (1.2), the rate of weekly benefit payable to a claimant for a week of unemployment that falls in the claimant's benefit period

(a) in the case of a claimant without a dependant is an amount equal to fifty percent of the claimant's average weekly insurable earnings in the claimant's qualifying weeks, and

(b) in the case of a claimant with a dependant is an amount equal to sixty-six and two-thirds percent of the claimant's average weekly insurable earnings in the claimant's qualifying weeks.

(1.1) Where two claimants under paragraph (1)(b) are related to each other as husband and wife or are living together in a common law relationship, either may elect to qualify as a claimant with a dependant.

(1.2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), in the case of a claimant who lost his employment by reason of misconduct or who voluntarily left his employment without just cause the rate of weekly benefit payable to that claimant for a week of unemployment that falls in the claimant's benefit period is an amount equal to fifty percent of the claimant's average weekly insurable earnings in the claimant's qualifying weeks."

To expedite the process, I have copies of my motion which I shall now have distributed to all senators.

• (2110)

Senator Lang: May I ask the mover of this motion a question? Your motion would not affect the premium payments by employer or employee? Am I correct in that?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

Senator Lang: Those people with dependants would get the same benefit as those without dependants, is that right?

Senator Roblin: When the amendment is put I shall try to explain this as best I can, and I shall leave it at that point.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That Bill C-14, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 15 to 20 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"24. (1) Subject to subsection (1.2), the rate of weekly benefit payable to a claimant for a week of unemployment that falls in the claimant's benefit period

(a) in the case of a claimant without a dependant is an amount equal to fifty percent of the claimant's average weekly insurable earnings in the claimant's qualifying weeks, and

(b) in the case of a claimant with a dependant is an amount equal to sixty-six and two-thirds percent of the claimant's average weekly insurable earnings in the claimant's qualifying weeks.

(1.1) Where two claimants under paragraph (1)(b) are related to each other as husband and wife or are living together in a common law relationship, either may elect to qualify as a claimant with a dependant.

(1.2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), in the case of a claimant who lost his employment by reason of misconduct or who voluntarily left his employment without just cause the rate of weekly benefit payable to that claimant for a week of unemployment that falls in the claimant's benefit period is an amount equal to fifty percent of the claimant's average weekly insurable earnings in the claimant's qualifying weeks.

It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the amendment?

Senator Denis: Is the amendment available in French?

Senator Roblin: I am glad my honourable friend asked that question because I had the advantage of the advice of the Law Clerk of the Senate in drafting this motion, and as he was drafting it he was making a request for a French version to be available to the house. I do not have it in my hand, but I know it is in the course of preparation.

I think I can explain this amendment briefly. This is the one that puts into effect the two-tier system whereby unemployed people with dependants retain the benefit rate of 66⅔ per cent, whereas the beneficiaries of the system without dependants have their rate set at 50 per cent. That is the point we have been proposing in the last little while. And we are saying in addition that in the case of a family where there may be some question as to whether the husband or the wife is the one with the dependant relationship, the family may decide among themselves who is to be considered as the unemployed person with a dependant, provided, of course, that the two of them are unemployed at the same time, and a lot of other technicalities of that sort. It does, however, make provision which we hope will make it possible to deal with the question of whether the husband or the wife is the person with the dependants when making a claim.

The other thing that this resolution does is that it reduces to 50 per cent the rate of benefit that would be received by anyone who left his job by reason of misconduct or without just cause. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Senator Thompson: May I ask the honourable senator a question? When he was considering his amendment, did he look at the breakdown concerning the number of young people and women who will be affected by that single clause?

And may I make a suggestion to Senator Forsey concerning his reference to the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Report? It might be of interest to him to have the reaction of the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Report concerning this particular amendment. As I understood it, they condemned it roundly as being discriminatory against women and young people.

Senator Forsey: In response to that, may I say that I lent my copy of the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Report to the Hansard people, and I should not venture, especially after I was tripped up by Senator McElman on my recollections before, to quote from memory. My impression is that Senator Thompson is quite correct: They were opposed to it.

If I may, I will make my contribution now to the discussion of this amendment. I should much have preferred, and had we gone into the Committee of the Whole I should have tried, to move myself the amendment that was moved in the other place by Mr. Faour, my fellow countryman from Newfoundland, deleting clause 5 altogether and leaving things as they stand now. But rather reluctantly and as a second best, a pis-aller, I am prepared to support Senator Roblin's amendment, even though I have reservations about it for the reason that Senator Thompson has indicated.

Senator McIlraith: Question!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those against please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it. I declare the motion in amendment lost.

Shall the main motion carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to move an amendment. I am afraid I haven't got the motion written out, and I must try to do so in time, but I should like to move that the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by deleting clause 4. I may mention that that is the clause dealing with the new entrants and re-entrants, and the amendment I am proposing is the one that was proposed in the other house by Mr. Clark of Vancouver, which I trust means that I shall have the support of my Conservative colleagues for this particular proposal.

Senator Benidickson: There are only two of them here tonight.

● (2120)

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Forsey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended by deleting clause 4.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the amendment in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it. I declare the motion in amendment lost. Is the main motion carried?

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to say something very briefly on the main motion for the third reading. Had we gone into Committee of the Whole, it was my intention to move a number of amendments. I am now, of course, precluded from doing so. My desire would have been to move every one of the amendments moved in the other place by the NDP. I should have had mercy, however, on my colleagues and proposed merely three or four of them. I will just mention the ones I should have picked out.

First, clause 2, the new paragraph (h), the one dealing with people employed less than 20 hours a week or getting less than 30 per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings. I should have wished to have added to that a further paragraph (i):

unless otherwise prescribed, paragraph (h) does not apply to an employee where the national unemployment rate that applies to him is greater than 4 per cent.

I should have liked also—although it would have been clearly out of order, because it would have been an amendment to the main act—to take a whack at the proposal which will now be embodied in the act to have both the existing paragraph (f) and the new paragraph (h). The new paragraph (h), in effect, gives the government power to do what it has already done by regulation and which it says it has the power to do under paragraph (f) by regulation, define in any way it sees fit what is meant by "inconsiderable attachment" to the labour market or "inconsiderable earnings" or whatever the phrase is.

What they are doing now is to put in the new clause defining the "inconsiderable attachment" and giving a sort of retroactive blessing to the regulation of somewhat doubtful validity, and keeping also the old paragraph (f) so that they will have a double-barrelled shotgun and they will be able, by retaining the old paragraph (f), at some future date to pass a regulation—or so they claim, with the blessing of the glorious and ineffable Department of Justice—empowering them, enabling them, to cut the thing down to five hours or five minutes or five seconds if they want to, or 5 per cent, or 2 per cent, or one per cent of insurable earnings.

I should have liked to have a whack at that, but, as I say, it would have been clearly out of order as an amendment to the main act.

I should like also, I think, to have chosen from the rich storehouse of NDP amendments in the other place—and assuming that one of the other amendments I should have liked to propose had not carried, which I think I could safely have assumed—I am sure they would have been knocked down like ninepins; the domino effect would have been remarkable—I should have liked to propose the amendment which was proposed in the other place to safeguard the provision in collective agreements referring to the level of unemployment benefits, because a large number of collective agreements in this country, as some honourable senators may know and some may not, contain provisions for what they call supplementary unemployment benefits under the collective agreements. I think this was pioneered by the United Automobile Workers, and they are so drafted that they refer to the existing level of unemployment insurance benefits under the act; and unless there is some kind of safeguarding clause, this will be jeopardized and we shall have added to the already considerable grounds for industrial unrest in this country, and industrial difficulties and industrial disputes, a further ground quite gratuitous to my mind, and most unfortunate and highly undesirable.

However, we didn't go into committee, and I have my one attempt to get an amendment, and it has been shot down, as I expected, and I am precluded from doing anything further. I merely, however, wanted to register my strong view that a large number of these amendments are hardly desirable. In fact, in the other house the NDP proposed the deletion of 10 clauses entirely—I think clauses 7 to 15—and the Conservative Party, in the motion I have just moved, and which has just been defeated, proposed the deletion of another one.

I wanted to put that on the record simply to show that in spite of the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune, which I have been the victim of, my head remains bloody but unbowed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on third reading I would just like to—Senator McElman: I rise on a point of order before the honourable senator speaks. I may be entirely wrong, but it is my belief that the Honourable Senator Forsey was not precluded from putting his amendments, in a bucketful if he wished, when he finished speaking. I believe the rule is quite clear on that. Since he was speaking, he was in a perfect position to offer amendments so long as he did not take them one at a time. He may put his amendments in and have them dealt with by the house.

Senator Roblin: On the point of order, honourable senators, what an impossible position that would place Senator Forsey in. He would put in his bucket of amendments, as we have been told, but what would the house do? Give them consideration on their merits, one at a time? No such thing. It would be debarred from doing so, if my honourable friend is correct. We would be obliged to vote on the whole shooting match. Has anyone heard of a more astonishing proposition to a legislative assembly like this, that we should be invited to throw our resolutions in by the bucketful, and have them voted out by the bucketful? I think that the proper procedure, recognized in any parliamentary body ever heard of, is to deal with resolutions and amendments one at a time. You can throw them out one at a time if you like, but that is the proper way to do it. I must say that I cannot agree with Senator McElman's suggestion.

Senator McElman: On the point of order that I raised, honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Roblin, or any other honourable senator, wished to see the procedure in practice, all he had to do was attend, as I did last evening, the House of Commons, where that procedure was followed, and where I heard no protest from any party, including his own. The amendments were put in in groups, and were dealt with individually by the house. The Speaker brought them on one by one, and they were dealt with one by one. The amendments, however, were brought in in large numbers.

Senator Roblin: Well, honourable senators, on the same point of order, it is perfectly clear that my friend is talking about something that took place in the Committee of the Whole, not at the third reading stage.

Senator Forsey: At the report stage.

Senator Roblin: At the report stage, rather. It was not on third reading. If one will peruse the Hansard of the other house, one will see that there transpired a lengthy discussion as to how this thing would be done. There were, I think, 30 different resolutions in connection with amendments that were printed in Hansard, and they were considered by the Speaker in order to combine the ones that said the same thing or were related. He therefore took the ones that were related and combined them, in consultation and by agreement. Now, that is perfectly sensible, but it is a quite different thing from what I understood my honourable friend's suggestion to be.

Senator McElman: I would simply like to say that very often in this house, since I have been here—that is, for a period of 12 years or more—the rules have been made available, perhaps in a form that was not intended, to make things easier for senators to achieve the dedicated purpose they have in mind. I rose tonight because of my feeling of goodwill at the Christmas season, and to see if that same feeling prevailed this evening. If it is not the wish of some honourable senators that it should so prevail, then that is nothing to me.

Senator Forsey: On the same point of order, honourable senators, I think I am correct in saying that the procedure in the other house took place on the report stage, yesterday. The third reading stage, I think, came today. Further, the procedure of the other house is under a specific rule which exists in that body and which, as far as I know, does not exist here.

● (2130)

To cut the whole thing short, I think it would be futile now, even if Senator McElman's very kind, generous and magnanimous suggestion were accepted, for me at this hour to take up the time of the house putting forward three or four amendments which would simply be knocked on the head so fast that the quickness of the hand would deceive the eye.

Senator McElman: I have never known my honourable friend to give up so easily.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before the question is put, there is one thing which I think is important to be put on the record. At third reading a good deal of very eloquent and skilful rhetoric, worthy of the Roman Senate itself, was brought to bear by Senator Forsey and Senator Roblin on the question of why we were not considering this bill in Committee of the Whole. This is not damning with faint praise; on the contrary, it is sincere praise for eloquence. However, all that both Senator Roblin and Senator Forsey said boils down to: "It is true that you have considered all these things in a committee prior to coming here; it is true that we could have moved all our amendments in committee, but for certain reasons"—which turned out to be not quite so good in the case of Senator Forsey; no doubt Senator Roblin had very good reasons for not attending the committee meetings—"we did not move all our amendments in committee, so even though the committee worked for three solid weeks, would you mind, please, doing it all over again?" That is all it comes down to.

Senator Forsey: Neither of us were members of the committee, and neither of us could have moved a single amendment.

Senator Roblin: I rise on a question of privilege, because it has been said that I could have moved my resolution in the committee. I think on reflection senators will agree that was not the case. I am not a member of the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lang, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that this bill be now read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "yeas" have it. And more than two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Motion of Senator Lang agreed to on the following division:

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, although I claim to lead nobody but myself in this chamber, I trust that some of my colleagues on this side, at any rate, will allow me the privilege of thanking my honourable friend for the good wishes he extended to all members of this house and to say that we certainly intend to take his sound advice and deal with the very difficult and controversial matters we expect to confront us when we come back.

I do thank him and all other senators for their good wishes for the holiday season, which we all heartily reciprocate, I am sure.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, before we break I want to pass on a message I have received from my friend the Honourable Senator Willie Adams of the Northwest Territories, that one of his constituents wants to wish everyone a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year—a fellow by the name of Santa Claus.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESSES AT INSTALLATION

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I ask that the address of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, P.C., at the Installation of the Right Honourable Edward Richard Schreyer, P.C. as Governor General of Canada on January 22, 1979, together with the reply of His Excellency the Governor General thereto, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day to form part of the permanent records of this house.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether the Leader of the Government named a seconder for his request. If not, I would naturally be pleased to second the request. I am sure that all honourable senators who were here, and others who may have watched the ceremony on television, will have been most impressed with both the speeches that were made on that occasion.

Senator Perrault: I know that all honourable senators appreciate the generosity of spirit which has prompted the offer made by the Acting Leader of the Opposition.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

TRAIN SERVICE BETWEEN NEW BRUNSWICK AND MONTREAL— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have replies to a number of questions asked before Christmas. I must apologize for the problems that arose which made it impossible to answer these questions in 1978, but we on this side are determined to present answers with greater alacrity.

The question asked on November 30, 1978, by Senator Riley related to train service between New Brunswick and Montreal. He stated that there were persistent rumours that the train schedule between Saint John and western New Brunswick and Montreal was to be changed in order to eliminate the convenience of the present schedule.

The issue, it has been determined, is that the Canadian Transport Commission is reviewing maritime rail passenger service in preparation for issuing a Preferred Plan and a Final Plan for Eastern Transcontinental Passenger Trains. I would point out that the plans are designated as the Preferred Plan and the Final Plan.

The background is that the Canadian Transport Commission held public hearings in the maritimes and Quebec from May, 1977, to July, 1977, regarding the Eastern Transcontinental Passenger Train Service.

A summary of evidence document was issued by the CTC in January of 1978. The CTC has reviewed the evidence presented at the hearings and has issued what it describes as a Preferred Plan. Comments on this Preferred Plan will be received and considered by the commission before a final plan is issued.

I hope that is now clear to honourable senators.

REDUCED AIR FARES WITHIN CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On December 13 last Senator Olson asked a question with respect to reduced air fares that, he said, "were instituted in Canada during this past season, some by way of charter and some by other arrangements, that provided Canadians with cheaper travel within Canada." On December 20 he asked the following supplementary question:

I am wondering whether the government leader would include in his communications to the officials he mentioned the suggestion that a reduced air fare from some of the outer extremities of Canada to Ottawa ought to be put in place, thereby making it economically possible for all Canadians to visit their capital at least once a year.

Honourable senators, the government firmly supports the continued expansion of low-fare opportunities for air travel in Canada, in keeping with its desire to encourage Canadians to see their country.

In 1978, the number and variety of reduced air fares available to Canadians was greater than ever before. Advanced Booking Charters, popularly known as "ABCs", were actively encouraged by the Minister of Transport and made available for the first time domestically.

Charter Class Canada fares were again offered by major scheduled airlines, with Air Canada and CP Air providing some 227,000 return seats in the summer of 1978, almost three times their offering for the same period in 1977. The new Air Canada domestic Nighthawk service and CP Air Courier Jet service provided late night flying at greatly reduced fares.

Allow me to offer an illustration of how these low-fare programs have benefited the traveller wishing to fly in Canada. The regular economy fare for a round trip between Toronto and Vancouver in July 1978, a month when the number of air travellers is at a peak, is $402. By comparison, the same trip on an ABC could have been taken for only $199, a saving of over 50 per cent of the economy fare. The corresponding Charter Class fare was $232, or a reduction of 42 per cent from the economy rate. The identical trip could have been performed on the Nighthawk or Courier Jet services for the price of $202, equal to a 50 per cent discount from the economy fare. Together these various options for low-cost air transportation represented a major improvement in the opportunities for discount air travel within Canada.

It should be pointed out to honourable senators, that while these programs were generally very successful, the available seats were not always used, not only in the off-peak period but also in the summer.

I understand that in 1979 all the low-fare programs will again be significantly expanded. As honourable senators know, the Canadian Transport Commission recently convened an open meeting to review the results of these programs in 1978, with special reference to the possible need for further adjustment of the regulations applying to the operation of ABCs. At this meeting, testimony by air carriers and tour operators indicated that substantial increases in the capacity of these programs are planned for 1979.

I trust that honourable senators will agree that these prospects augur well for the continued success of low-fare programs for air travel in Canada, and emphasize the government's commitment to continue to encourage such opportunities.

VIA RAIL—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On November 28 Senator Riley asked a question with respect to the policies of VIA Rail. I have been provided with an overview of Transport Canada's Railway Passenger Development Program in order to provide the general information requested by Senator Riley. I am prepared to make this rather long document available privately to Senator Riley, or ask that it be appended to today's proceedings, if that is his desire, because it will take a long time to read it. It describes the most significant elements of the VIA Rail relationship with Transport Canada and the other railway companies. The information contained in this document should satisfy Senator Riley.

VIA Rail is responsible for planning, marketing and managing of passenger services. Its promotional initiatives on radio and television, in newspapers, and through the Commonwealth Games and Loto Canada, are intended to encourage passenger travel by rail.

● (1410)

VIA Rail has been making use of CN and CP marked material and supplies. It is expected that they will continue to do so until such time as a full transition to the VIA logo has been achieved. To do otherwise would, in the view of the Canadian Surface Transportation Administration, be a waste of expensive materials.

STUDENT LOANS

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 21 last, Senator Buckwold asked a question respecting an alleged default on government guaranteed loans provided to students. The information requested by Senator Buckwold has been provided to him in writing. Some of the figures supplied as a result of inquiries which went forward may be of interest to honourable senators.

The position as of October 31, 1978, with respect to the 55,000 students to whom Senator Buckwold referred in his question, is as follows: Number of those who have repaid in full, 19,800, or 36 per cent; number of those who are in the course of payment or who have justifiable reason for non-payment at this time—and a justifiable reason might be, for example, that they are unemployed—25,300, or 46 per cent; number of those whose cases have been passed to the Department of Justice for judgment action, 6,000, or 11 per cent; number who have not yet been located, 1,700, or 3 per cent; and number of those whose accounts have been written off for medical reasons, 2,200, or 4 per cent.

FISHERIES

RESEARCH LABORATORY, HALIFAX—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 1 last, Senator Smith (Colchester) inquired as to the present status of plans to discontinue the federal fisheries research laboratory in Halifax.

As announced on December 21, 1978, the Fisheries Technological Laboratory in Halifax will remain open.

Senator Marshall: That was known three months ago.

Senator Perrault: Such good news bears repeating.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY MINISTER—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on November 28, 1978, Senator Olson asked a question respecting an alleged statement by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs "to the effect that we are seeking to import beef from areas in respect of which our health of animals regulations would have prohibited such imports to date because of problems associated with foot and mouth disease, and that sort of thing."

In reply to the honourable senator's question, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has never suggested importing beef from areas which do not meet our health of animals regulations. The minister has suggested increasing the imports of low-quality beef from those countries already exporting such meat to Canada.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, arising out of the two questions put by Senator Riley, I wonder if any kind of pressure can be brought to bear—not improperly, of course—to straighten out some of the operations of VIA in Saint John, New Brunswick.

On returning to Montreal from Saint John recently, I wanted to take the train over the CPR line. I called VIA at the number given in the telephone book and requested a bedroom on the night train to Montreal. I was asked to wait and after a bit they said, "The train that leaves at 8.20 p.m.?" That did not accord with my recollection, and I said "Oh." They said, "You want to go by Moncton, don't you?" and I said, "No, no, no, I don't want to go by Moncton." They then said I would have to call CP Rail, and that rather took me aback. I should have thought that when you called VIA Rail now you would get information about any train run by VIA Rail. I should have thought they simply would have asked whether you wanted to go by the CP line or the CN line, by Moncton, or direct. But instead of that I got this curious sort of thing.

When I got to the CPR station—away off from the centre of town as they are so often nowadays—I found that they seemed extraordinarily vague about the whole business of VIA, and they seemed extraordinarily vague also, I might add, about Senate passes. Apparently this was a new breed of animal for them. However, eventually I got it all arranged. But if that chap in the VIA Rail office had not suddenly said, "Oh, well, of course, you want to go by Moncton," I would probably have found myself in Montreal, not the next morning, as I wanted to be, and had to be, but away on in the next afternoon.

It seems to me that this thing could be tidied up in some way so that anybody calling VIA Rail would get the information about VIA Rail and not just this kind of runaround from one place to another. They were all very polite, and I do not mean to suggest any discourtesy, but the thing was quite needlessly elaborate, to say the least, and I have no reason to suppose that what befell me may not befall other people as well.

I don't know whether Senator Riley will back me up on this, but I rather suspect he might.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that officials of VIA Rail are consistent readers of the proceedings in this chamber and will benefit from the guidance which they have received from two honourable senators.

GRAIN

DELIVERY TO EXPORT POSITIONS—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question arising out of a meeting held recently in Winnipeg dealing with the attempt to increase our capability to deliver grain to export positions. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if an agreement has been worked out between the provincial governments, who made some offers, the federal government, the railways and the grain companies, by which we can increase our exports and our capability to deliver grain to export positions, especially those on the west coast, and more specifically the port of Prince Rupert?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government about the business that may be coming before us? I ask this question because there have been indications that what has come to be known as "the order of government business" in the other place has been changed from what was announced before the recess. Could he give us any information as to the likely order in which bills will be coming to us in the next few weeks?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope to have information which I am able to discuss with the Deputy Leader or the Leader of the Opposition tomorrow. I was in communication with the house leader in the other place an hour ago, and was told that a final determination has not been made. However, there should be some information forthcoming in the next few hours.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—BAGGAGE CHECKING—QUESTION

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to the Leader of the Government referring to VIA Rail? Is there any reason why one cannot check one's baggage from Saint John through to Ottawa. One has to pick it up at Montreal, take it over to the CN station, and then recheck it to Ottawa. We should keep in mind that Ottawa is the capital of the country.

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: I am not in a position to provide definitive replies to questions respecting VIA Rail.

THE CONSTITUTION

POSSIBLE REINTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us whether the government will reintroduce Bill C-60 during this session? If so, when?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not in a position to provide a complete reply to that question at this time. However, I would not expect Bill C-60 to re-emerge in the form in which it was considered by Parliament during the last session.

HONOURABLE MAURICE BOURGET, P.C.

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to comment that it is good to see so many honourable senators present and restored to good health and buoyant spirits after the recess.

We are particularly delighted to have with us one of our colleagues who has not been here since December 1, and who has gone through a siege in hospital. I refer, of course, to the highly respected Honourable Maurice Bourget.

Senator Langlois: And he looks well too.

AIR CANADA'S AIRVELOP SERVICE—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 2—By Senator Marshall:

1. Why are the Provinces of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island excluded from Air Canada's AIRVELOP service?

2. Can the Passport Office in Ottawa use AIRVELOP to mail a passport on an emergency basis to citizens of Newfoundland or Prince Edward Island at a cost of $8.00, as can be done in all other provinces, or do they have to use Expedair at a cost of $44.00?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

The management of Air Canada advises as follows:

1 and 2. The Provinces of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island are not excluded from Airvelop service. The product provides services between any points served by Air Canada within Canada, including St. John's, Gander, and Stephenville, Newfoundland, and Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island.

NEWFOUNDLAND

RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 3—By Senator Marshall:

1. How much money was provided under the Summer Job Corps Program of the Federal Government Direct Employment Strategy (Department of Employment and Immigration and CMHC), for six students in the Port au Port Peninsula to assist potential R.R.A.P. clients in becoming aware of the R.R.A.P. Program?

2. How many citizens were interviewed and how many were assisted to make applications for R.R.A.P.?

3. How many homes were visited in the study of housing conditions to determine those who would be eligible for R.R.A.P.?

4. What information was received by the students employed on the land availability projects from (a) municipal councils and (b) the municipal planning division of the Newfoundland Department of Municipal Affairs and Housing, on (i) Corner Brook, (ii) Deer Lake, and (iii) Stephenville?

Reply by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs:

I am advised as follows by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation:

1. An initial budget of $8,435 was provided for the Summer Job Corps project, "Housing Stock Rehabilitation in Small and Remote Communities", employing six students in the Port au Port Peninsula to help potential RRAP clients become aware of the RRAP program. Of this, $7,860 was spent.

2. Approximately 800 householders in the Port au Port Peninsula were visited by the students, who outlined the Program to the homeowners and pointed out its benefits. RRAP brochures were distributed, and homeowners who expressed an interest in applying for RRAP assistance were referred to CMHC's delivery agent for the area, Newfoundland and Labrador Housing Corporation.

3. More than 120 RRAP applications were given to the students by NLHC, to determine priorities for immediate inspection and approval.

4. (a)(i) The City of Corner Brook provided access to the assessment rolls which gave information as to the owner of the land, the appraised value, and land size. Information on the zoning bylaws, and large scale maps of the City including maps of water trunk lines, was also supplied.

(a)(ii) The Town of Deer Lake provided information on zoning bylaws, water lines, roads and other municipal services.

(a)(iii) The Town of Stephenville provided access to the assessment rolls which gave information as to the owner of the land, appraised value, and land size. The town also provided information on zoning bylaws and large scale maps of the town.

(b) The municipal planning division of the provincial Department of Municipal Affairs and Housing provided the following information:

(i) Corner Brook—Municipal Planning Area Boundary Maps.

(ii) Deer Lake—Municipality and Municipal Planning Area Boundary Maps, zoning and water and sewer maps.

(iii) Stephenville—Municipality and Municipal Planning Area Boundary Maps and zoning plan.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELECAST OF WORLD CUP SOCCER GAMES—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 9—By Senator Bosa:

1. Was the CBC offered free of charge by O.T.I. (Organisation de la Télévision Ibero Americana), and Mascia Enterprises Ltd. to telecast 10 World Cup Soccer Games, which included 4 semi-final games, and the right to replay the final game two weeks after it has been played?

2. Was this offer supposed to have been exercised before September, 1977?

3. Why did the CBC not accept the offer?

4. Has the CBC any information regarding the extent to which Canadians would have watched the games in question if they had been shown on its network?

5. What role did Mr. Eric King play in this matter?

6. Is the CBC contemplating a different approach to securing the rights of telecasting the next World Cup Soccer Games?

Reply by the Secretary of State of Canada:

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. No. OTI solicited a bid from CBC but awarded North American television rights to Magnaverde of New York. Mascia Enterprises did not, to the CBC's knowledge, offer any games free of charge.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

4. CBC has no information regarding the extent to which Canadians would have watched the games if they had been shown on CBC television.

5. Mr. Eric King, the executive director of the Canadian Soccer Association, tried to persuade the CBC's program officers to obtain World Cup games.

6. The approach to obtaining future World Cup games is not in the CBC's hands. The Fédération Internationale de Football Association (FIFA) will decide how the games will be made available to North America and, if its decision is to place them on the same basis as 1978, the CBC will submit what it considers a fair bid.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I would yield to the Honourable Senator Godfrey.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators, my main purpose in speaking in this debate is to discuss the question of entrenchment of a Bill of Rights in the Constitution. I want to make it perfectly clear at the outset that I am in favour of a Bill of Rights in the Constitution which will take priority over, and have an overriding effect on, other non-constitutional legislation. It is only the matter of entrenchment that I want to raise questions about.

Before dealing with this question, I should like to comment on a proposal made by Senator Austin when he spoke in this debate on December 14 last. I thought Senator Austin made an absolutely first-class contribution to this debate with his scholarly and thoughtful speech, but I would comment on his suggestion that senators be indirectly elected by proportional representation by being placed on lists prepared by the Prime Minister and the leaders of each of the officially recognized national parties which would be issued on or before the closing date for the nomination of candidates in a federal general election.

I do not want to go into my own ideas as to how and by whom senators should be appointed. I have been active in the deliberations of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution. My own ideas, which even now are somewhat flexible, I have made known in the committee meetings which have been held in camera. In my opinion, the appropriate time for me to debate my own specific ideas for Senate reform is in the debate on that committee's report on the subject, which I hope will not be too long delayed. What we are debating here is the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution and that report, except that it approves the proposal in Bill C-60 to "allocate 14 additional seats in the second chamber, 12 of which will go to the provinces in western Canada," does not make any specific proposals for Senate reform. It does, of course, discuss at some length the concept of a second chamber and the proposal for a House of the Federation contained in Bill C-60.

To return to Senator Austin's proposal, he developed, I thought in a very persuasive and convincing fashion, the concept of the Senate as a political judiciary. To indicate his thesis I should like to quote from page 370 of Senate Hansard. He said:

—if it is the responsibility of the upper chamber to defend the nation from the will of a capricious executive which controls a tame lower house, then the members of the upper chamber must themselves be protected from, and independent of, the will of the executive.

I prefer Senator Austin's suggestion that the Prime Minister and the leaders of the other parties announce their list in order of preference at the time of or before the official nomination day, to the provision in Bill C-60 that the nominations to the Senate by the party leaders be made after the election. This would certainly give the Senate a bit more credibility than the procedure provided for in Bill C-60. The Senate could claim more of a political power base because the nominations by the respective leaders would be, in varying degrees, an issue in the election. I would presume that the party leaders would want to minimize the issue by nominating high calibre persons.

However, my first reaction to Senator Austin's proposal, when he outlined it in committee, was that it would make the members of the Senate as tame as the members of the House of Commons because they would worry about being excluded from the party list at the next election if they opposed their party's policies in the Senate. Senator Austin took care of that in his speech in this house by providing that each senator elected would have the right to be given the same priority on the party list for subsequent elections taking place within a stipulated period, and he suggested 10 years.

One further comment that I should like to make in the same area is that unless a senator was at or near the top of his party's list, he would have a direct personal interest in the outcome of elections, and that might tend to make him more partisan, which would, of course, be contrary to Senator Austin's "independent judiciary" theory of the role of the Senate.

While I believe that this house is a political body, and there is nothing wrong with members being politically oriented towards one of the political parties, that does not mean that they should be highly partisan in that respect. Let us not kid ourselves, however. The fact is that many senators, including myself, are party partisans in varying degrees. It is only being highly partisan that I deprecate, and I personally have made a conscious effort not to be so. Furthermore, I have rarely seen even a hint of party partisanship during committee meetings. There is certainly a degree of predictability in the approach which many senators take toward issues that are raised in committee from time to time, but that, in my opinion, is because of where their fundamental philosophical convictions lie in the political spectrum rather than in their loyalty to any particular political party.

Senator Austin performed a useful service in describing—and I quote him—"the present theoretical basis for the Senate." My concern that having a direct personal interest in the outcome of an election might tend to make senators more partisan is probably, I must confess, just about as theoretical as Senator Austin's description of the basis for the Senate.

Many senators who are supporters of political parties in this chamber are just as keen to have their particular party win the next election as they would be if their own continued presence in this chamber depended upon it. Certainly I will work as hard as I can for the return of the present government, as will my good friend, Senator Flynn, for its defeat, although by doing so I will be working for the return of a government which, if it gets its way, will force my own premature retirement as a senator by abolishing the Senate. One cannot be much more loyal to a party than that.

I have one last comment on Senator Austin's remarks about the Senate and its role as a "political judiciary." While I am in complete accord with him as to the concept, I was not too impressed with some of the actual examples he used to show that the Senate had performed this function in the past in order, in his words, "to defend the nation from the will of a capricious executive." Certainly the Coyne affair is a good example. But what has the investigative work of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and its study of Kent County, or the work of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty in Canada, got to do with a capricious executive? What has the work of the other committees referred to got to do with it, either? Their work was extremely valuable, generally speaking, in making technical revisions to legislation which the government, for the most part, accepted gratefully when they were shown where they had erred. But, really, it is stretching it a bit to claim that in some of those cases the Senate was defending the nation from the will of a "capricious executive," and I really do not think that it helps the Senate's cause to make claims which do not stand up under close scrutiny.

● (1430)

Now I come to what I really wanted to speak about, namely, the question of entrenching a Bill of Rights in the Constitution.

First of all, what is meant by entrenching a Bill of Rights in the Constitution? I am sure all honourable senators know what "entrenchment" means. However, like Senator Austin, I want to address my remarks to the general public as well as to those persons, including members of this chamber, who are familiar with this subject.

Entrenching something in the Constitution simply means that that part of the Constitution cannot be amended by an ordinary act of Parliament or a provincial legislature, but can only be amended or repealed by following a more complicated or more difficult procedure, which is provided for in the Constitution and usually referred to as an amending formula. The Senate committee's first report did point out that the effect of entrenchment could not be fully assessed until an amending formula was agreed upon, and, of course, until there was an amending formula there would be no entrenchment. We are, therefore, considering this question of entrenchment a bit in the dark at the present time, though that should not preclude discussion of the general principle.

In some circles, when you talk about entrenchment of a Bill of Rights in the Constitution you are talking about the equivalent of motherhood. I must confess that when the committee started its hearings I had been brainwashed over the years to the extent that I simply took it for granted that, of course, a Bill of Rights should be entrenched in the Constitution. It was the evidence of two witnesses on the subject, Professor Walter Tarnopolsky and the Honourable J. C. McRuer, a former Chief Justice of the High Court of Ontario, that started me questioning my views on this subject.

As I have defined for the benefit of the general public what "entrenchment" means I think it might be useful, before I discuss the question of entrenchment, to say what a Bill of Rights is supposed to accomplish. Professor Tarnopolsky says that what a Bill of Rights is all about is expressed in clause 4 of Bill C-60, dealing with the stated aims of the Canadian federation, where it says:

—and to ensure, as well, that neither the power of government nor the will of a majority shall interfere in an unwarranted or arbitrary manner with the enjoyment by each Canadian of his or her liberty, security and well-being.

Obviously, on the surface it would appear that the only way you can control the power of government to have legislation enacted which would interfere in an unwarranted or arbitrary manner with an individual's enjoyment of his liberty, security and well-being would be to have a Bill of Rights entrenched in the Constitution. However, it is not quite that simple. The United States had an entrenched Bill of Rights, while Canada had no Bill of Rights at all, during the last war. That did not help or protect the Japanese-Americans, however, because their fundamental political, civil and legal rights and freedoms, which a Bill of Rights is supposed to protect, were encroached upon, and they were treated just as badly by the United States government as the Japanese-Canadians, who were not protected by a Bill of Rights, were by the Canadian government.

What Professor Tarnopolsky told the committee was that what was important was whether or not a Bill of Rights had an overriding effect on legislation enacted subsequent to the enactment of the Bill of Rights.

Would subsequent legislation be subject to the terms of a Bill of Rights? Professor Tarnopolsky points out that the Drybones case in the Supreme Court of Canada does not go that far, because the provision in the Indian Act, which was being considered, preceded the enactment of the Canadian Bill of Rights. There were statements by individual judges in that case, and in later cases, which said that the Canadian Bill of Rights did apply to subsequent legislation, but all these statements were obiter, and not binding upon the court, so that there still exists some possible doubt.

At page 4:14 of the committee's proceedings Professor Tarnopolsky is reported as saying:

—with us the supremacy of Parliament has been around long enough and is strong enough that the principle of Parliament being able to amend any prior statute is too ingrained. The only limitation on that rule—that is, that a subsequent act of Parliament can override a previous act of Parliament—I think arises out of the constitutional status of the previous act.

He argues that the mere fact of formally placing a Bill of Rights in the Constitution, whether it is entrenched or not, would be sufficient to convince a possibly reluctant Supreme Court of Canada in the future that it has the same primacy that any other part of the BNA Act has been given in the past, and would, therefore, have an overriding effect on and prevail over subsequent legislation that might be inconsistent with it.

The effect, therefore, would be that unless the Bill of Rights in the Constitution were specifically amended as a constitutional amendment, all legislation, either prior or subsequent, would be subject to the Bill of Rights and no law would have any effect that was contrary to the principles enunciated in the Bill of Rights.

I would now like to discuss the evidence given before the committee by Mr. McRuer. Besides being a former Chief Justice, Mr. McRuer was, in 1964, appointed head of the Ontario Law Reform Commission and the Royal Commission inquiry into civil rights in Ontario and issued a report on "A Bill of Rights for Ontario".

His evidence was most interesting and particularly persuasive because his views on the subject obviously came from vast experience and knowledge and profound thought on the subject. By any standard it was a most impressive performance, but particularly so when one realized that Mr. McRuer is 87 years of age.

I would like to quote from Mr. McRuer's testimony before the committee. At page 6:28 he says:

It has been the history of entrenched bills of rights that the courts have distorted the language of such a bill to give it entirely different meanings . . . I do not think that judges are the best interpreters for the purpose of legislating what is meant by general language.

He says later, at page 6:29:

I am sure that if the proposed Charter of Human Rights were adopted the provinces would lose large areas of their legislative power, and the provinces would be very foolish to consent to the entrenchment of the proposed bill. We do not know what social conditions will be 10, 15 or 20 years hence. I have seen social conditions change a great deal. After all, we are a democracy, where legislative power is exercised by those who have authority to exercise it. It should not be delegated to the judges, who are not responsible to the people. When I say that I am not casting any reflection whatever on the integrity of the judges. All I say is that the legislative power should be in the hands of those who legislate.

Mr. McRuer, at page 6:30, goes on to say:

Those who favour entrenchment seem to have an idea that they would get better decisions from the courts if the rights were entrenched. Time and again it has been said that the way the Supreme Court of Canada has dealt with cases arising under the Bill of Rights has been unsatisfactory. It would be that much worse if they were entrenched, because if the Bill of Rights is not entrenched and is not satisfactory, amend it and get it right. But you then have the guidance of what the court has held it does not apply to. If it is in the public interest to correct the court's decision, that can be done by Parliament or the legislature. My view is that an adequate and proper Bill of Rights is the proper selection, and entrenchment, especially without knowledge of the amending formula, would be an exercise in speculation as to whether it would be beneficial or detrimental to the rights of the individual.

Professor Tarnopolsky, in his evidence at page 4:30, pointed out that many people are opposed to an entrenched Bill of Rights because of the experience in the United States where the Supreme Court there held from the 1890s to 1937 that minimum wage laws, maximum hour laws, and child protection laws were invalid because they were in contravention of the due process clause in the American Bill of Rights.

In another well-known constitutional case involving civil rights the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Dred Scott decision of 1857, declared slaves to be property with no right as citizens, which decision, it is generally agreed, helped start the Civil War.

As Mr. McRuer pointed out, there has been considerable criticism of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to our present Bill of Rights. Many of these decisions, which reflect the majority's lack of enthusiasm for a Bill of Rights, were made possible by faulty drafting of the present Bill of Rights. This is corrected in the proposed Bill of Rights contained in Bill C-60. However, experience in both Canada and the United States certainly tends to support Mr. McRuer's argument that a Bill of Rights should be amendable in the ordinary way so that interpretations by the courts which Parliament does not think reflect the intent of the Bill of Rights can be easily corrected. That does not mean that Parliament will act in an arbitrary way in amending a Bill of Rights that is in our Constitution.

From a practical point of view I am sure that any government would be very loath to amend a Bill of Rights to change an interpretation made by the courts unless it was convinced that public opinion was very strongly behind it. Let us not forget that the English Bill of Rights is an ordinary statute passed in 1689 which can be amended by an ordinary statute, but which has never been specifically amended although laws in contravention of it—for example, gun control laws—have been enacted.

Although the combined effect of the evidence of Professor Tarnopolsky and Mr. McRuer had persuaded me that entrenchment was not really necessary, I was by no means free from doubt so that I did go along with the consensus of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution, and I did vote for entrenchment.

● (1440)

What has happened since to make me decide to make this speech and reverse the position I took in the committee of going along with the majority? Senator Austin's concept of the Senate as a political judiciary had some influence, but the greatest consideration was the attitude of the provinces on the question, expressed at the Dominion-Provincial Conference on the Constitution. To put it bluntly, they were against it. I think that this is one area where I believe compromise by the federal government is in order. In fact, in order to get agreement with the provinces on a Bill of Rights I would go as far as agreeing to a "notwithstanding" clause similar to the one in the present Bill of Rights.

There has been only one statute since the present Bill of Rights in 1960 which has employed the "notwithstanding" provision, and that was in 1970, when the government replaced the War Measures Act by the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, which contained a clause that it was valid notwithstanding that it might be in contravention of the Bill of Rights. This, I believe, demonstrates that governments would be very cautious indeed about proposing legislation containing a "notwithstanding" clause exempting the act from the overriding effect of a Bill of Rights.

In any event, experience in the past in other countries has shown that in time of war or great tension a Bill of Rights is always subject to certain implied limitations that the courts will support, as the Japanese-Americans can well testify. Public opinion, and, I would hope, the Senate, would not stand for legislation exempting an act from the provisions of the Bill of Rights, except possibly in time of war or great tension, so that it doesn't really make that much difference from a practical point of view as to whether a Bill of Rights has a "notwithstanding" clause in it or not, and whether it is entrenched or not.

I would like to end this speech with another quotation from Mr. McRuer's evidence, which can be found at page 6:34:

—I think it is a very considerable reflection on our whole Parliamentary system if we have to depend on those appointed to the bench to take leadership in the defence of human rights. I am not prepared to indict our parliamentary system in that way. I have great faith in our democratic system of legislation.

And I might say that I have also, particularly if the Senate effectively performs its function referred to by Senator Austin as a "political judiciary."

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 447)

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESS BY THE PRIME MINISTER, THE RIGHT HONOURABLE PIERRE ELLIOTT TRUDEAU, P.C.
AT THE INSTALLATION OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EDWARD RICHARD SCHREYER, P.C.

Your Excellency,

It is a great pleasure to extend to you, as you assume the office of Governor General, an assurance of the warmest good will of the Government, Parliament and people of Canada. In their name, may I ask that your first official act be to convey to Her Majesty, the Queen of Canada, a message expressing our loyalty and affection.

[Translation]

You are taking on the responsibilities of your high office at a challenging time for Canada, and a no less challenging time for its Governor General.

The scope of that challenge is the true measure of both the trust which the citizens of this country place in your hands, and of their lively confidence that you will be a wise and helpful steward of that trust.

At first glance, the prerogatives of the Sovereign and of Her representative in our parliamentary democracy seem startlingly simple: the right to be consulted, to encourage and to warn.

But on closer examination, what a wealth of potential for furthering the common good lies hidden in those simple words. What great opportunities for helping to create and define the evolving spirit of a dynamic nation can be discovered in that simple description of your office.

Canadians look to their Governor General as a person of stature, broad experience, and commitment to Canada, a person whose insight and breadth of vision can lead us all to a deeper appreciation of the values we share, the greatness of character we have inherited, and the destiny which can be ours if together we will it into reality.

Above all, we look to you to help lead us toward a keener awareness of the strength and value of our country, its people, its system of government, and its rich history of achievement. Upon that awareness can be built an even stronger Canada, with a renewed commitment to individual liberty, and shared opportunity.

[English]

You and your office are therefore a potent symbol of our unity and united purpose, and a symbol as well of the many streams of humanity which flow together into a uniquely Canadian experience.

Your commitment to public service, demonstrated as a Member of Parliament and as Premier of Manitoba, together with your thoughtful perspective on this country's problems and opportunities, eminently suit you for the role you are about to play.

Canadians have two special reasons to look to your term of office with more than the usual sense of anticipation. For the first time, the meaning of Canada will be expressed in a vice-regal voice tinged with a truly western accent.

We will hear about ourselves and our potential from the vantage point of one who identifies strongly with the open spaces and open people of the west—with their history of pioneering struggle to set down new roots in a new land. We will be hearing from a man who shares the pride of the Canadian west in its achievements, and the enthusiasm of western Canadians to tackle the problems of further development.

The second reason why we look upon your appointment as an event of historic importance is that, again for the first time, our first family will represent those millions of Canadians who trace their ancestry to countries other than Great Britain or France.

I share with countless others the well-founded hope that you will help lead all Canadians toward a deeper understanding of the richness and variety of our cultural heritage.

Personally, I look forward to my weekly meetings with you, because I know that a man who has known the joys and anguish of elective office will offer unusually well-informed advice.

On behalf of Canadians everywhere, I thank you for accepting the responsibilities which are now yours.

I wish to acknowledge as well the great debt of gratitude which we owe to Her Excellency, Mrs. Schreyer. We are all mindful of the fact that, in supporting your decision, she has herself willingly assumed an equal share of your official responsibilities, and an equal share of the resulting personal sacrifices.

To both of you, and to your children, we extend our best wishes for many happy years in Ottawa.

May all your days in your new home be filled with joy and peace. May duty be a pleasure. May God grant you satisfaction and fulfilment in the service of Canada.

REPLY OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL TO THE ADDRESS OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Prime Minister,

I shall be honoured to carry to our Gracious Sovereign Queen Elizabeth II the tidings of loyalty and affection which you have entrusted to me on behalf of the Canadian people. In accepting this task, I convey to you my determination to carry out those responsibilities which she has entrusted to me on Her behalf.

My wife, Lily, and I are grateful for the welcome and for the kind words you have expressed to us. We shall always cherish them.

[Translation]

I realize I am accepting a responsibility and honour that has been accorded to only four other Canadians. I am following in distinguished steps, and not only theirs. My lifetime has spanned the decades from Lord Tweedsmuir to the Right Honourable Jules Léger. Those who served Her Majesty as Governor General in those years brought great and varied distinction to the office. I pray I am equal to this task, to this office and to this time.

All previous Governors General of Canada have symbolized for Canadians that stability and continuity of national life and institutions so necessary to any cohesive civilization. This need is all the greater in a society whose very essence is the diversity of its culture and the vastness of its geography, in the society that is our Canada. The task is clear: the task is real.

[English]

As I undertake it, I have already received thousands of messages of good will and support. My wife and I are encouraged by them. In the coming days and weeks we shall seek continued support from all who care about Canada—and they are legion, whether Canada for them is the land of their ancestors or the land of their choice. All these Canadians, this blessedly overwhelming majority in every province of Canada, will provide, with the help of providence, a yearning for the preservation of one Canada that will not be frustrated, a wisdom that will not be denied. Canada remains our transcending objective. The reasons, both in our spiritual and in our material well-being, are self-evident.

[Translation]

It is with profound sadness that I note a minority view that does not acknowledge that in an enlightened federal Canada there is scope for the fullest expression of cultural and linguistic heritage. The preservation of our country's economic capacities and its weight in the councils of the world surely need not be sacrificed in order to achieve a greater measure of freedom. The freedoms we now share and cherish are equal to the best of countries on this planet. They are surpassed by none. They can be greater still. It is not necessary to break the bonds of our common history to do so.

For, whatever our origins, wherever we live in Canada, we have all contributed to the building of this country. Each Canadian, though unable truly to realize the greatness of the collective achievement that is unfolding, is playing his part. I would recall the eloquence of my predecessor, the Right Honourable Jules Léger, in this regard:

This might be said of generations of honest and unassuming people of Quebec, who have always been faithful to their homeland, having no other and seeking no other. Men of the land, men of the sea, of the church and of business, I pay them warm tribute for without their courage and tenacity the Canada we know today would not exist. They lived their lives along the shores of the mighty river that bore their ancestors and shaped their destiny.

The faith of our history is borne in these, the words of a man of wisdom and patriotism and exemplary courage, who well understands the importance of French-speaking Canadians to our broadening mosaic. I can only concur with these words. They capture the pride we share in our diverse origins and the recognition we share that in those origins lies the source of our striving toward the larger horizons of spiritual tolerance and material progress that come with a larger unity.

[English]

To this, I must add the bringing to this new land, first to the Atlantic and then the central provinces, much more than a century ago, of British parliamentary institutions and English common law and jurisprudence. The stability and magnanimity of the English-speaking peoples who came to these shores is another great stream of our history.

But in the confluence of these two great streams that have shaped our Canadian character must surely be seen the force of two additional tributaries adding to the majestic flow of our culture and civilization. One is, of course, our brothers and sisters, Inuit and Indian. They constitute a group of Canadians who are caught between their traditional ways and contemporary opportunities. Whichever course they choose will bring grave difficulties for those involved, for those working with them.

The other stream is that multiplicity of groups that chose Canada or whose ancestors chose Canada. I know their contribution to Canada. The ethnic mosaic has made for a more colourful and interesting Canadian way of life. Those who make up this mosaic share the goal of retaining the clarity of that mosaic, for in the clarity of their cultural distinctiveness lies its beauty.

There is also shared experience—the shared experience of adversity. Whether we think of the earliest habitants, or the coueurs des bois; of the United Empire Loyalists of Upper Canada or the Maritimes; whether we think of the Scottish fur traders of the northwest, or that incredibly small pocket of English and French-speaking settlers known as the Red River Colony at the Fort Garry and the St. Boniface Missions; whether it be the Icelandic-speaking settlers after 1870 or German-speaking Mennonites and Hutterites at the same time—one the victim of nature, the other of human persecution; whether it be central European immigrants pulling their belongings across the untilled Prairies by sheer physical exertion or the frustration of the Indian and Metis fearing the loss of hunting grounds, and the coming of malnutrition, pestilence and disease, in all this history one word stands out—adversity. Our problems of today are as nothing. To succumb to pessimism, to allow fragmentation, to accept the shattering of the Canadian mosaic is to break faith with all who endured so much to build so well what we have today.

What we have today can be secured if we remind ourselves of some self-evident truths spoken by a Canadian of venerable years but still active among us. He said, the truth is that Confederation was conceived of by men of two different but equally rich communities. Bilingualism and multiculturalism are facts of Canadian life, they cannot be avoided nor should they, for they are assets, not liabilities; positive factors, not negative ones.

But there is also a need to speak for all of Canada. It is what we share that allows us the richness of our diversity and we need to remind ourselves of this whenever we become preoccupied with our differences. As we shape present policies we preserve the necessary options for future generations of all Canadians.

What I believe many people earnestly hope for is not merely the toleration of our differences, but the realization that to be a good Canadian each of us must be true to his or her heritage. This noble sentiment was eloquently expressed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he said:

Three years ago when in England, I visited one of those models of Gothic architecture, which the hand of genius, guided by an unerring faith, had moulded into an harmonious whole. This cathedral was made of granite, oak and marble. It is the image of the nation I wish to see Canada become. For here, I want the granite to remain the granite, the oak to remain the oak, the marble to remain the marble. Out of these elements I would build a nation great among the nations of the world.

Dieser Dom besteht aus Granit, Eiche und Marmor. In derselben Weise sehe ich auch Kanada. Denn hier soll der Granit Granit bleiben, Eiche bleibt Eiche und Marmor bleibt Marmor. Aus diesen Elementen schaffe ich eine Nation, die gross ist unter den Nationen der Erde.

Це відбиток той нації, якою я хотів би щоб Канада стала. Я хочу, щоб тут граніт залишався гранітом, дуб дубом, мрамур мрамуром. З цих елементів я би збудував одну із могутніх націй світу.]

[Translation]

What Sir Wilfrid Laurier clearly believed, what he shared with others, with Sir John A. Macdonald, with Brown, with Blake, with Sir George-Étienne Cartier, what they share with my predecessors and with me, is that a diverse society in a vast land can experience a broadening of the mind and spirit—a magnanimity of the soul. Their idealistic dream has become almost the full reality. We need but work together to avoid slipping backward toward the fragmentation of intolerance.

[English]

Today I say with the deepest conviction that we can do this. Within 50 years, a moment in the sweep of history, our Canada has gone from aloofness to tolerance, and beyond tolerance to respect for, indeed a deep desire for, the retention of the differentiations of our heritage and culture.

[Translation]

But the need for this vigilance, for this effort, is incumbent upon us all and particularly on whoever holds this office.

[English]

It is said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier testified to Lord Grey's work as Governor General, that he gave his whole heart and his whole soul to Canada. If those words could ever in truth be applied to me, as a third generation Canadian from the wheatfields of the west, by my contemporary Prime Minister—only then could I feel that I have kept faith with all who love our country. One Canada, whole, undivided, the benefits of our pluralism intact.

[Editor's Note: The Governor General said the following in Polish:

Oby pamięć naszej pracy i naszego kraju była błogosławiona na wieki. Niech żyje kanadyjski kraj i naród na wieki wieków!]

[Translation]

May the memory of our work and of our country be blessed forever.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, January 24, 1979

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

ASSISTANT CLERK OF THE SENATE

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT OF ALCIDE PAQUETTE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to take this occasion to mark the retirement at the end of last year of one of the Senate's most talented and hard-working officers, M. Alcide Paquette, our Clerk Assistant.

[Translation]

Mr. Alcide Paquette has served Parliament for forty years. He worked in the office of the Leader of the Opposition and in the Prime Minister's in the other place until 1957. He came to the Senate in June 1958.

[English]

His work for us was outstanding. His knowledge was vast, as was his patience. His guidance was often sought and his advice always accepted.

His interest in Parliament was not confined to this place. Mr. Paquette was Executive Secretary of the Canadian group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union from 1960 to 1965, and he was also on the International Executive of the Association of Secretaries General of Parliaments.

Honourable senators, we in this place have always been fortunate in the quality of our officers. Alcide Paquette for 20 years maintained that high quality. I am sure that all honourable senators will wish him a long and fruitful retirement.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am pleased to join the Leader of the Government in expressing to Alcide Paquette our heartfelt appreciation for his long and devoted services to the Senate.

Indeed, it will be hard for most of us, because he has been here for 20 years—a few of us have been here longer but not many—not to see Alcide Paquette at the Clerk's Table, not to see him perform his duties with the diligence and competence that were obvious to all.

As the Leader of the Government pointed out, he has had a 40-year career here in Ottawa, half of which was spent at the other place where he served the Leader of the Opposition and, after 1957, where he worked for a while in the Prime Minister's Office.

Alcide was diligent, studious, meticulous and very competent. He was everyone's friend. Everyone liked him, as was pointed out by my friend, Senator Bourget, whom I want to greet upon his return to the Senate. He is looking very fit, in very good health.

Senator Langlois: Dangerously well.

Senator Flynn: Yes indeed, but not more so than before, I hope.

Alcide Paquette discharged many responsibilities in the Ottawa community. He was extremely active in benevolent organizations which I am sure he will continue to be.

So, on behalf of the opposition, and also joining the whole Senate, I wish him happy years in retirement. I am sure he will fill those years in ways both very useful and very pleasant.

By the way, looking at the biography of Alcide Paquette, I noticed that today is also the birthday of our clerk Mr. Robert Fortier. Though there is no connection between the fact that Alcide Paquette retires today and the fact that our clerk is celebrating his birthday, I do want to take this opportunity to extend to the latter our very best wishes.

To Alcide I wish, once again, a happy retirement. I also hope he will come back to see us, which I invite him to do. In addition, I am sure that on occasion, and, even perhaps quite often, the Clerk of the Senate or one of us shall want to ask him for his good advice.

[English]

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I am very pleased to note that we are honouring Mr. Paquette. Mr. Paquette tendered his resignation on December 28, 1978, but we of the Senate have been fortunate indeed to have had him all to ourselves for 20 years. Throughout that time we have had the benefit of his parliamentary experience and his invaluable services. I personally will miss him very much, because I turned to him a great deal for guidance and advice. He always felt that he was a public servant, and did his utmost to answer any question that was presented to him.

It is fitting that the Senate should express to this scholarly man its appreciation of the remarkable service rendered by him. He served the Senate as Assistant Clerk for the past 20 years, but served Parliament for more than 40 years, with devotion and loyalty and in a gentle and kindly way. He is therefore assured of the Senate's gratitude for those faithful years as Assistant Clerk.

From time to time I would walk into his office to talk to him, because I enjoyed doing that, and because if you were a little short of knowledge he would always be able to fill in. I went in one day and asked him, "Where does the expression 'another place' come from?" He said, "I don't know offhand. I wouldn't be able to tell you. I should be able to tell you, though, and I'll look it up."

I had tried to find out myself from the library what the origin of the expression was, and had not been successful; at least, I did not think I had received a complete answer. So Mr. Paquette said to me, "I'll see if I can find out." He made inquiries and came up with an answer but he didn't think it was a complete one, and he said, "I'm going to write to the Clerk Assistant of the House of Lords in the United Kingdom to see if he can help." Here, in part, is the reply he received in a letter dated November 2, 1978:

We have done a bit of research into the origin of the use of the expression 'another place', which as you say was used by Mr. Stansfield in a debate in the Commons of 15th July 1860. It looks as though this was not the first use of the expression because Erskine May (1st edition, 1844, p. 199) states that, since the daily publication of debates, "most members in both Houses have learned a dexterous method of evading [the rule] by transparent ambiguities of speech". One example, at least, of an earlier use of the phrase is offered by Burke's Speeches (Collected Speeches, 1816, Vol. III, Speeches in the House of Commons, 6th February): "The present minister, he understood, had been called a 'heaven-born minister' in another place".

It was not world-shaking, but it was important in that he made it his business to give as complete an answer as he could possibly get. His was the approach of a scholarly man. He wanted to see Parliament work as well as possible. That is what makes the difference. That is why we miss him, and that is why he was one of the great public servants.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, Senator Croll spoke of a "Mr. Stanfield" who was around in 1860. Are we to believe in reincarnation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I join in the good wishes extended by the Leader of the Opposition to the Clerk of the Senate, Mr. Robert Fortier, who has served us so well. I join all other honourable senators in wishing him a very happy birthday.

CBC FRENCH NETWORK BROADCAST—
QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wish to rise on a question of privilege concerning the CBC French network broadcast of the Governor General's installation ceremonies a few days ago.

Yesterday, a senior official of the parliamentary library phoned me because she was annoyed and furious at the fact that, during the broadcast, the CBC reporter said: "The Governor General is now swearing allegiance to the Queen of England"—not the Queen of Canada—"the Queen of England", and he also called the Governor General a "Neo-Canadian". In fact His Excellency is a third generation Canadian. So this lady was absolutely furious because of this CBC broadcast of the installation ceremonies and I promised her that I would raise the question in the Senate, because I find this rather strange, to say the least, and I think that this report somewhat distorts reality.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Forsey rose on a question of privilege. If one had to rise every time the CBC makes that type of mistake or adopts an attitude that is completely contrary to what the situation calls for, for instance when the Péquiste message is being advocated in Quebec, one would be rising constantly and we would not get much else done in the Senate.

AGING

DESIRABILITY OF ESTABLISHING GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENT— NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I give notice, supported by Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche) and Senator Marshall, that on Tuesday next I will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a department of the Government of Canada to deal with all matters relating to aging.

Senator Flynn: A department?

Senator Croll: Yes.

Senator Flynn: With a minister?

Senator Croll: Yes.

PUBLIC REFERENDUMS

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Senator Goldenberg, moved, seconded by Senator Molgat, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the subject matter of the Bill C-9, intituled: "An Act respecting Public Referendums in Canada on Questions relating to the Constitution of Canada," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: I do not intend to object to the motion, since Senator Goldenberg talked to me earlier about it and I said I would support it. However, there are a few questions that flow from the motion. First, what is the urgency? I can understand that the Leader of the Government will say that we may have an election called next week.

Senator Perrault: It will be this year.

Senator Flynn: Are you sure?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Asselin: Are you sure?

Senator Flynn: Would you stand up and promise that?

Senator Asselin: We don't believe you.

Senator Flynn: The second thing about the motion is this. Although I have never opposed the so-called Hayden formula, I am beginning to think that it has been the subject of some abuse. I recall Bill C-14, which we dealt with before we adjourned for Christmas. Under the pretence that the subject matter of the bill had been studied by a committee in advance of the bill coming to us, the Senate then said that it was not necessary to go through the procedure of first, second or third reading, the way we normally do, but that we could do it all at once, without the usual delays and without providing an opportunity to refer the bill to a standing committee or to a Committee of the Whole. I for one cannot forget and maybe cannot forgive, what happened on December 21 and 22 last year.

• (1420)

Everything happened the way I said it would. We did not have the opportunity in this house to deal with that very important bill in the normal way. It is not because the subject matter of the bill has been examined by a committee that we should dispense with dealing with it in the normal way. That is what happened on December 22 last, after the rules had been suspended. Probably at Easter time we will be confronted with the same situation and forced to do the same thing as the government forced us to do last year with regard to the bill concerning the amendments to the Labour Code. We were promised then that the people who wanted to make representations would be given an opportunity to do so. We are still waiting for them to be given that opportunity. They won't be given that opportunity. The Leader of the Government knows very well they won't. It is quite clear that there will be an election. This is not because the Leader of the Government says so, not because of rumours, but because it is unavoidable.

For that reason I would like the chairman of the committee to assure me that, firstly, there is urgency and, secondly, that this formula will not be used to thwart the normal procedure with regard to that bill when it reaches us—if it does reach us.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, my friend Senator Flynn, who has always co-operated with me in a way for which I thank him, knows very well that I cannot give all the assurances he has asked for. All I can say is that the reason the committee, at a meeting which was attended by Senator Flynn, unanimously agreed that we make the subject matter—

Senator Flynn: I did not hear that correctly. You say the committee had a meeting?

Senator Goldenberg: At the last meeting.

Senator Asselin: He was not there.

Senator Flynn: What date was it?

Senator Goldenberg: I am sorry. I was under the impression Senator Flynn was there. Senator Asselin was there, I believe.

Senator Perrault: Speaking for you.

Senator Flynn: I have nobody speaking for me in the same way that Senator Langlois speaks for you.

Senator Langlois: You are lucky.

Senator Goldenberg: Insofar as urgency is concerned, what I said to the committee was that I was advised—and I have since checked—that this is one of the few items which have priority for the remainder of this session of Parliament, and it is a matter of considerable importance.

I think Senator Flynn will agree that because the proposed referendum is something new, I thought, and the committee agreed unanimously, that we could save time by making a thorough study.

Senator Flynn: How much time?

Senator Goldenberg: I am not in a position to answer that, but that is all there is about the urgency. I am definitely assured that it is priority legislation intended to be enacted before whatever we expect to happen will happen. When that will happen, I cannot say.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, might I suggest a possibly useful procedure with respect to some of the concerns expressed by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition? The procedure of pre-studying a bill has been quite successful in this chamber in the past, but perhaps this parliamentary "technique" should be referred to the Rules Committee so that its use and implications can be discussed. The Rules Committee could, perhaps, make recommendations with respect to the use of this procedure. Such a referral might well assist the thinking of senators in this area.

Senator Flynn: Give us the assurance that you will give us at least three days.

Senator Perrault: As far as the proposed legislation in the area of referendums is concerned, I feel certain that the Senate, in its wisdom, through a pre-study will be able to assist not only the Canadian people, but also the members of the other place.

Senator Flynn: The wisdom of the Senate was not very obvious on December 21 and 22 last.

Senator Perrault: I hesitate to suggest that the honourable senator may express a partisan viewpoint in this regard. Usually he endeavours to be so non-partisan.

Senator Flynn: No more of a partisan attitude than was exhibited by the Senate majority last December 22.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, surely the Senate can contribute to the national dialogue in this very important area of referendums—this proposed new method of ascertaining public opinion on certain matters. If honourable senators feel the issue of pre-study should be reviewed by the Rules Committee, then perhaps that should be done.

Senator Flynn: I have no objection to the practice of pre-studying legislation, but what I suggested is that it should be used and not abused.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, as one of the victims of what took place on December 21 and 22, and without any partisan bias in the matter, I should like to express the hope that the committee will not, in this case, do what that other committee did and simply report that it approves the principle of the bill and that then we should be told that there is no necessity of having any committee proceedings on this. This is something that was felt very strongly, not only by the few members of the opposition who were here on that occasion, the corporal's guard, unfortunately, but was also felt very strongly by me. I fully share the misgivings of Senator Flynn on this subject, and I do so from my seat as a supporter of the government. I do not think that was the proper procedure to adopt, and I hope it will not be repeated, especially on a matter of this importance.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should like to say a word or two on this subject as well. My recollection is that I was present at the meeting to which Senator Goldenberg has referred, and I recall that I concurred in the suggestion that was then put forward. At that time I never suspected that that process would be prostituted in the manner in which it was on December 21 and 22. Therefore, although I do not intend to oppose this motion for pre-study, I want to go on record, along with my leader, Senator Forsey and anyone else who may have the same views, and say that, while I agree that this procedure of pre-studying legislation as developed by Senator Hayden has been successful in the past, we should not allow it to be abused. The manner in which it has suddenly come to be abused is reprehensible and unsatisfactory. If Senator Goldenberg wishes the Senate to engage in this pre-study procedure, I think Senator Goldenberg ought to give us some kind of assurance that the same sort of abuse will not occur again.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I have a few words to say on this. First of all, I concur with the statement made by Senator Forsey suggesting that the wording of the report of the committee on the other piece of legislation might have been wrong because it recommended the principle of a bill not yet before the committee. In that case, the committee was simply conducting a pre-study of a bill.

I also rise to support the suggestion of the Leader of the Government that the Rules Committee conduct a study of the pre-study procedure. The Rules Committee, as a result of such a study, might be able to produce worthwhile recommendations for the avoidance of a repetition of the difficulties which were brought to our attention this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators on his side of the house.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, in speaking to this motion, Senator Forsey referred to what happened on December 21 and 22 last. During the course of his remarks, he said it was unfortunate that there was only a corporal's guard of the official opposition in the chamber at that time. I was one who was absent from the chamber—

An Hon. Senator: With good reason.

Some Hon. Senators: Explain.

Senator Grosart: I thank honourable senators for their tolerance in respect of my absence on that occasion. I regret to say that I was absent, but I assure the house that had I known what was going to take place during the course of those two days I would not have been absent. I could have been here and would have been here, and I am ashamed of the fact that I was not here to support my leader and others on this side who objected to a situation which, in my view, was a disgrace to the Senate.

I have read carefully, over and over again, the record of what happened on those two days. What was being considered was exactly the same type of motion that is before us now, in which we are asked to agree to apply what I named many years ago the "Hayden formula" to a particular situation. The adoption of the motion now before us would result in a suspension of our rules, which is exactly the situation with which the Senate was confronted on December 21 and 22 last. The purpose of the motion then before the Senate was not thoroughly disclosed, but obviously, as it turned out, it was to restrict Senate debate on public bills. That is what happened.

The objection put forward by the Leader of the Opposition and others on this side was one which was fully sustainable, and should have been sustained. The fact of the matter is that the Senate was not permitted to debate a very important bill. This clearly left, in my view, an entirely different attitude on the part of those who object to this kind of steamrolling of legislation through the Senate—and that is what it was. In view of that experience, I would ask for Senator Goldenberg's assurance, assuming we agree to this pre-study, that this procedure will not be used to prevent a full debate on the measure once it has been received by the Senate.

I reiterate, what happened on December 21 and 22 last in respect of Bill C-14 was a disgrace to the Senate. Although I was not present on that occasion I fully support the position taken by my colleagues, and by some honourable senators who are not members of this group, in relation to what happened at that time. It was a clear case of steamrolling, and I regret that when the Leader of the Government asked over and over again for assurance that there would be no steamrolling—

An Hon. Senator: The Leader of the Government? I think you mean the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Grosart: Yes, the Leader of the Opposition. I am sorry. In view of these and some other events, I find it very difficult not to anticipate at least one possible new role for the distinguished Senator Flynn.

Senator Frith: Don't hold your breath.

Senator Grosart: I am not holding my breath. Far from it. It should be obvious to Senator Frith that I am not holding my breath at this time. I am using my breath to make a protest against something that he agreed to, and for which he should be ashamed.

Senator Frith: I am not.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Grosart: I would not expect that you would be—far from it, judging by some other aspects of the record.

I say to honourable senators that if we are going to use this so-called Hayden formula in this manner, we should have the assurance that it will never again be used in the way it was used on December 21 and 22.

The suggestion is made that the matter be referred to the Rules Committee. I cannot believe that that would in any way assist in resolving the problem we are faced with. What does the Rules Committee have to do with it? We are dealing here with a case of the suspension of the rules. What can the Rules Committee do about that, except to say that the rules should not be suspended? Of course, the rules can be suspended. That is the crux of the question. It will not help in the slightest to refer this matter to the Rules Committee. The committee will just come back and say, "We have a right to suspend the rules any time we like." Will the Rules Committee say that that right of the Senate to control its own affairs and to suspend its own rules should not be used in this way? Of course not. The Rules Committee will not say that.

What we need is an assurance from the leadership of the Senate that the Hayden formula will never again be used as an excuse for the intolerable steamrolling of legislation that took place on December 21 and 22.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, since mention has been made of something that I am supposed to be ashamed of, namely, my participation in the debate of December 21 and 22, it seems to me that when my friends on the other side speak of the abuse of the Hayden formula, and when they use such strong adjectives, and in a petulant way, concerning the fact that they wished to block that legislation—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Frith: —to block the passage of that legislation, it having been considered in committee, they are speaking about anything that thwarts their objective of government by the minority.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order and on a question of privilege, I do not know if Senator Frith was here on December 21 or 22—

Senator Frith: I was.

Senator Flynn: Well, if he was, he did not understand anything of what went on. That may not be entirely new, of course. What I was suggesting at that time, and what he should have understood—

Senator Frith: It does not go without saying that everything you say is understandable, senator.

Senator Flynn: No, of course not, but some of your colleagues, the more intelligent who did understand, might have explained it to you. I had asked merely that we have two days, and I indicated clearly that we did not want to block that legislation, that we knew very well that it would pass. I merely wanted an orderly debate on second and third reading and reference to committee.

● (1440)

There was no indication of our blocking anything at all. On the contrary. We said that we would arrange for the passage of this bill in two days, but that we did not want to be forced to pass it in five hours on the Friday night. That is what we said. There was no intention of blocking anything. There was no partisan attitude in that. It was only because some of us thought that the Senate should deal with such important legislation in the normal way. But that was refused.

Senator Forsey: And with the opportunity of making amendments.

Senator Frith: Unlike Senator Flynn, I am prepared to accept that it is possible he had a different, but intelligent, point of view. Apparently, any view that is not the same as his is not intelligent. However, his was his point of view, and I was simply putting my point of view, which I think is intelligent, on the record. Apparently, if it is not his point of view, it is not intelligent.

Senator Perrault: I invite all fair-minded senators to read the proceedings of this chamber on December 21 and 22. The Leader of the Opposition, who talks about the alleged great frustration of democracy on those two dates—

Senator Flynn: No, the frustration of the Senate.

Senator Perrault: —is applying his very selective memory in recalling the background of the Bill C-14. Moreover, honourable senators, when the Leader of the Opposition talks in terms of fighting for democracy on the 21st and 22nd of December, let me remind him that he was not even in the chamber on the 22nd.

Senator Flynn: That is the kind of petty attack I have come to expect from the Leader of the Government. When he is under pressure he strikes below the belt; but, of course, he is not very tall and that can be excused. No, I was not here on the 22nd—

Senator Perrault: You certainly were not.

Senator Flynn: —for personal reasons. I was not here for personal family reasons and for other reasons as well, one of which is that I did not want to participate in the charade the Senate was going to be forced to conduct. However, I was prepared to be here on the 27th, the 28th and the 29th, if necessary. But the cowardly and servile majority here decided that they would bend to the will of the Leader of the Government in the other place to close the house as soon as possible in order to facilitate the public's forgetting that piece of legislation.

Now, when my friend Senator Frith says that what is intelligible to me is not necessarily intelligible to him, or vice versa, I would suggest to him simply to read what occurred. The Leader of the Government said to me that I have a selective memory. Well, I dare anyone to say that what I have said today about that particular incident on the 21st is wrong. I dare anyone to point out to me where I am wrong.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, if I may say so, I was here on the 21st and 22nd of December. I take exception to the remarks just made by the Leader of the Opposition, one for whom I have great respect, and, without raising a matter of privilege, I would ask him to withdraw one word that he put on the record when he referred to the "cowardly and servile majority."

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Langlois: Shame!

Senator McElman: I find that most offensive.

Senator Flynn: I will withdraw "cowardly."

Senator McElman: Thank you for that.

Senator Flynn: I withdraw the word "cowardly."

Senator McElman: That carries forward my respect for the honourable senator, in that he will do the gentlemanly thing, and also my respect for him as a partisan orator, when he leaves on the record the other words.

I find it passing strange that he can take such great umbrage and offence when it is drawn to his attention by the Leader of the Government that he was not present on a given day, and then in the next breath offer insult to all of those on this side who were here on that day.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I think strictly, I am out of order in rising again, but I am in excellent and numerous company. I should like to point out something that I think has not yet been pointed out about those events which took place before Christmas. In effect, the procedure adopted prevented some of us from moving amendments. For all practical purposes, it closed off the possibilities of making amendments. That is what it amounted to and that, I would argue, is a very serious interference with the rights of this chamber.

Senator Langlois: Not at all. No.

Senator McElman: You are wrong, wrong, wrong.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, may I plead innocence? I never anticipated that this motion would bring about this debate.

Senator Flynn: Apparently we had nothing else to do.

Senator Goldenberg: And when I say that I plead innocence, it is because I was not here on December 22. I left early on the 21st. My motion is certainly unrelated, so far as I am concerned, to what occurred on those days.

Senator Grosart said that my motion is a motion to suspend the rules. But it is not a motion to suspend the rules of the Senate with regard to the normal passage of a bill through the Senate. It is simply a motion to suspend the giving of the usual notice of motion under rule 45(1)(e), and I shall explain to honourable senators why I did it this way. My friend Senator Flynn will admit that I consulted with him.

Senator Flynn: I have said that already.

Senator Goldenberg: Yes. The reason was simply this: There are meetings already arranged by other committees, particularly the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on the subject matter of the Income Tax Act and of the Bank Act. I have heard that the Transport and Communications Committee may be meeting as well. Our committee has never before made a study of the subject matter of a bill and I thought it would be useful, having regard to the importance of this measure and to the fact that the government has described it as a priority measure, to proceed with a Senate study at this time. I certainly had no intention of planning to restrict the debate on the bill. Even if it were within my power—and, of course it is not within my power—I would not have the intention to recommend in any way that the debate on the bill, when it comes here, be restricted.

I repeat that my motion is not a motion to suspend the rules with regard to the normal passage of the bill when it comes here.

Senator Perrault: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, may I advise that the meeting will be called to order at 3.30 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Croll be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator McIlraith on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

HEALTH AND ENVIRONMENTAL CONDITIONS—QUESTION

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government today's press communiqué of the National Indian Brotherhood complaining in particular of the government's recent budget cuts for Indian health care, and, at the same time, ask the government leader to impress upon his cabinet colleagues the need to review this matter and to investigate the problems leading to the high morbidity, and consequently the low life expectancy, of the Indian peoples, as stated in the communiqué; and rather than cut, to try to find more resources to help improve their health and environmental conditions.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. Hopefully a statement can be provided by the minister responsible for the health services of Canadians of Indian descent. That statement will be brought to the Senate at the earliest opportunity.

TRANSPORT

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY—TIRE PRESSURE SURVEY

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I regret very much that the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester) is not in his place at this time. On December 12 he asked a question about tire inflation, and I now have the reply. However, I think I should wait until he is with us before providing the answer.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEA AND AIR FREIGHT SERVICES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I see that Senator Marshall is with us today. On December 6—

Senator Flynn: Are you in charge of noting absences and presences? Apparently you make a record of everyone's absence or presence.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, insofar as it is possible, I think it is useful to have those who ask questions present when replies are given. The questioners are then in a position to challenge the responses, if they so desire. I think this is a healthy manifestation of democracy. The Leader of the Opposition should approve of this concept in view of his long history of supporting democratic institutions.

Senator Langlois: It is a matter of courtesy.

Senator Perrault: I regret very much that the Leader of the Opposition seems to have had such a difficult holiday period. He has not returned to us in the buoyant good spirits that one might have expected.

Senator Flynn: Because of what happened before we adjourned.

Senator Perrault: I cannot help the Leader of the Opposition if he finds no comfort in the recent polls that were taken by the Gallup organization. However, I hope that he will not share his unhappiness with the rest of us.

Senator Flynn: I do not share your optimism.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on December 6, 1978, Senator Marshall asked the following question:

It has to do with a letter of November 28 from myself to the Minister of Transport concerning the cutback and downgrading of freight services to Newfoundland by sea and air. Since this action contravenes a commitment that rail freight services would be maintained and no lay-offs would occur until the final report of the Sullivan Commission on Transportation in Newfoundland is published, would the Senate leader provide the information, which is of concern to many Newfoundlanders?

I now have a statement. Transport Canada has found no evidence that cutbacks and downgrading have taken place in the freight service to Newfoundland by sea and air. On the contrary, as traffic volumes increase, the existing services are expanding and, as commercial opportunities arise, new services are provided and new entrepreneurs enter this transportation market. In 1977 a company known as Chimo Shipping initiated a container service by sea from Montreal to St. John's, and in 1978 Federal Commerce and Navigation expanded its existing Halifax to St. John's service and is now offering a tractor trailer freight service by sea between these two points.

While individual carriers may adjust their operation to fluctuations in business from month to month, the government does not attempt to influence operational decisions by the commercial carriers. There are no indications that such adjustments, should they take place from time to time, would have any direct effect on CN's mode of operation of the railway and maintenance of employment levels on the railway until the end of the Sullivan Commission.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Austin asked a question on November 28—

Senator Asselin: He is here.

Senator Perrault: I note as usual that the honourable senator is in his place.

Senator Flynn: Ho, ho.

Senator Perrault: Senator Austin said:

I should like to ask the government leader to assure the Senate that neither the government nor the Canadian National has any intention of selling any equity in CN—

In reply, the capital stock of the Canadian National Railway Company is held by the Minister of Finance in trust for Her Majesty, and the company has no power to issue capital stock to anyone except the Minister of Finance without the approval of the Governor in Council. The government has no intention at this time of selling or of authorizing Canadian National to sell any capital stock of the Canadian National Railway Company.

I have a number of other replies, which I shall be prepared to present tomorrow.

APPLICATIONS FOR POSITIONS AS STEWARDS AND STEWARDESSES WITH AIR CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, which has to do with the reply I received to question number 30 on the order paper regarding applications received by Air Canada for positions as stewards, male and female, by province in 1977.

I am astounded at the reply, which stated that Air Canada received 9,538 applications but that no one was hired in 1977. I am one who is concerned at the deterioration in ground services provided by Air Canada. If this is an example of what they are doing—that is, going to the trouble of advertising for stewards and stewardesses, receiving 9,538 applications and going to the expense of interviewing them when it is obvious that their original intention was not to hire anyone—then I consider it ridiculous.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he would clarify the situation, which seems to me to be amazing. As the Leader of the Government suggested, I challenge the answer given to my question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the information which has been presented by Senator Marshall certainly invites further information from Air Canada. If 9,000 people applied for those positions and not one was hired, it suggests an incredibly high standard or some other factor which, I agree, should be explained.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HALIBUT FISHING INDUSTRY—INTERIM AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, the government leader, coming from British Columbia, is aware of the serious problems that are about to be faced by the British Columbia halibut fishing industry. There has been some accommodation of fishing rights on the Atlantic coast, but as yet no agreement with respect to fishing rights on the Pacific coast.

The facts are that the B.C. halibut fishing industry took a considerable portion of its product off American waters, which are not now available because of the dispute on other fishing matters with the United States. The halibut fishery is not in contention.

My question to the government leader is whether it would be possible for Canadian and American negotiators to effect an interim agreement, for this year at least, with respect to the halibut fishery on the Pacific coast, so that in the fishing season, which starts within the next month or two, a very serious economic loss to British Columbia fishermen can be prevented.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

EAST COAST FISHERIES—CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the same subject concerning the evident agreement on the east coast between Canada and the United States. The Leader of the Government indicated that temporary boundaries would be designated. Is there any possibility of our getting the information, and, indeed, a map, showing the boundaries that have been established on the east coast of Canada between Canada and the United States in the fisheries cold war?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the entire question with regard to all of our coasts is most important, and I shall request of the minister responsible for ocean fisheries a complete statement which can be brought to the Senate.

BELL CANADA—OWNERSHIP OF CONTROLLING INTEREST IN IRAN—QUESTION

Senator Norrie: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the government leader. Could he find out—I am asking this question on behalf of someone who has sought this information from me—who owns the controlling shares of Bell Canada in Iran? Is it Canada or Iran?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if that information is available through one of the government departments, it will be obtained. However, a direct inquiry of Bell Canada may well bring forth the information sought.

THE CONSTITUTION

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to the Honourable Senator Desruisseaux.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, with leave, first of all I would like to say a few words about a former senator who died a few days ago.

The Senate was saddened to hear these past few days of the death of one of its former and most distinguished members, the late Honourable J.-Eugène Lefrançois. Our colleague, who would have soon been 83 years old, died after an active and fruitful career spanning over nearly 30 years in Parliament to which he made a useful contribution. He had just recently resigned.

The late Senator Lefrançois was interested in and participated constructively in civic functions in his area, his province, and the country he loved so much—Canada. He vanishes from the public scene, leaving behind only friends and colleagues who held him in high esteem and will miss him.

To the distinguished members of his family in this trying moment I offer the most sincere condolences of my family, myself, as well as those of the Senate.

May I also be permitted to say a few words about our former Governor General. I would like to join with other members of this house in thanking Mr. Jules Léger, the outgoing governor general, and Madame Léger, for the exceptional services they gave Canada during Mr. Léger's tenure of office as representative of Her Majesty Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada.

At the same time, I congratulate his successor to the office of Governor General of Canada, Mr. Edward Schreyer. We wish His Excellency, Mrs. Schreyer and their family great reward and happiness in the performance of their duties during their tenure of office.

Honourable senators, I appreciate this opportunity to express my views on the Constitution of Canada. We have already heard excellent points of view expressed on the reforms proposed in Bill C-60 which we studied in advance here, to give our country a federative constitution acceptable to all its members, particularly with respect to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Senate and the Bill of Rights.

I am not an expert on constitutional law. I have been in the Senate since 1966—12 years. Before that I had the privilege of acquiring good experience in the practice of corporate law, as well as the advantage of participating actively in the administration of the world of business, information, industry and finance for over 50 years.

So that is how I see things but I am not among the best experts on the reforms to be made to the Constitution which has governed us since Confederation.

However I have my own personal views with respect to what needs to be done to give us greater unity at home, good brotherhood among us and a prosperous future for our country.

A few years ago, we in the Senate expressed our views on certain reforms to be made to our Constitution. The report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons made excellent recommendations on which I have already commented following several other senators. Those reforms were to be implemented only after constitutional approval. Bill C-60 tabled last year hardly takes into account the recommendations that were made.

Left on the shelves following the prorogation in the month of October 1978, Bill C-60, we are told, is to be revised and reintroduced during the fourth session. Personally, I doubt it, but it gives us a new opportunity to refine our observations and our criticism, and to propose on our side more constructive recommendations, making sure of their constitutionality.

Bill C-60 which was introduced during the third session last year proposed a "House of the Federation" to replace the Senate which was created in the Charter of our Confederation by our federative members. Bill C-60 was pigeonholed after the prorogation. There are now persistent rumours to the effect that this bill will be reintroduced but with some important amendments this time and without the formula for the abolition of the Senate and its replacement by a "House of the Federation". I think it is wise in the circumstances to wait for the revised Bill C-60 to make more elaborate comments.

I have nothing against the Constitution which has been ruling us since Confederation. I would be pleased to continue to live under the Constitution in its present form. What we should criticize now is its erroneous and incorrect interpretation both by the central government and by some of our provinces. It seems to me that we have derived excellent benefit from it up to now. As far as I am concerned, I think it would have been difficult to have a better Constitution. The Constitution of 1867 enabled us to pursue for more than a century an aggressive development in every endeavour, and our economic growth is undeniable and it continues even in the difficult period we are going through.

It has protected our individual independence, our beliefs, and our social and economic liberties. It has also contributed to the prosperity of each of its federative members which in the last ten years saw their disposable personal income increase by 118 per cent, and their average family income go up by 35 per cent in real value. Thanks to our Constitution and the work of all Canadians, we have become one of the most prestigious and influent nations in the world and one of the richest industrialized countries.

Thanks to the many undertakings that our federal Constitution has encouraged, Canada is also one of the richest countries in the world as concerns standard of living since we rank second among the 15 most industrialized countries.

Of course, we can still improve the original Constitution by making it more flexible and better able to serve all its federated members, and by adding the missing preamble. It has no soul. Its weaknesses, since it has some, can be corrected with the goodwill of the federated members. Still, the Canadian Constitution now ensures an acceptable protection for the rights of individuals in our federated society. It remains that it must be correctly and fairly interpreted and better respected by all.

Moreover, the existence of the Senate is not one of the weaknesses of our government system. On the contrary, its existence and its operation in our Parliament have contributed considerably to the progress accomplished by the nation, about which I talked earlier, and to our social and economic advances. It would be quite wrong to try now to replace it by a House of the Federation, a formula which remains controversial and doubtful, which would have weakened and even limited powers and provide a forum for intensive discussion of our most political issues without being empowered to pass legislation, and would preserve and amend the Constitution possibly unilaterally and even anti-constitutionally in the future.

The federated members of Canada would lose in the exchange by accepting that the Senate be replaced by an impoverished system with a doubtful constitutional value, that is a House of the Federation. I believe that they are well aware of it and that they reject such an exchange. I am also convinced that we should reject consideration of a second House called the House of the Federation if this proposal is once again included in the new Bill C-60 which we are told will probably be introduced during this session.

However, the role the Governor General of Canada, which was mentioned I believe in this bill, should be better defined. The nation has expanded. It has developed and has now reached maturity. In fact, our country is now at the forefront of the other countries because of its successes, its great influence and its acquired importance. Canada is in third place among western countries with a rate of growth which compares favourably with that of other countries. This is undoubtedly the result of the good operation of the Constitution that our country adapted more than a century ago. The role of the Governor General has changed. This role should now be defined in light of the many functions which have been added to it throughout the years. His official duties can hardly remain vague and obscure or be subjected to political discussions. From all points of view, the Governor General of Canada deserves this clarification and this definition of his duties and extended role. When he introduced the new Governor General, the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre E. Trudeau, mentioned this fact last Monday as he was announcing the extended duties of the new Governor General. From now on, he has a full-time job.

Many believe that all possible motives for criticism of the appointment system of Supreme Court judges should be eliminated. There are many possible solutions that could protect our highest court from criticism. It is up to us really to agree among ourselves, as members of our national federation, on the procedure for appointing judges to our Supreme Court. Therefore the method of appointment must be perfectly constitutional, with ground rules established jointly by the provinces and the national government.

In a country such as this, two systems of law are needed. They must remain distinctive and accessible without disadvantage to Canadians of both origins wherever they are in Canada, and they must be entrenched in the Constitution itself. More than ever it is important that our freedoms of thought, of creed and of action be clearly defined in our Constitution and understood by Canadians across the land. We certainly expect clear and distinct entrenchment in the proposed preamble to a renewed Constitution of those freedoms and equalities for each and every Canadian. The new preamble should also include in my view a strong call to Canadian patriotism. We must give the Constitution the kind of soul it is still lacking, as we gave it the national anthem and flag.

As far as the Senate is concerned, serious consideration is called for, because Bill C-60 suggested in the original legislative draft that the present Senate be replaced by a so-called House of the Federation with members chosen within provincial legislative assemblies by parties represented in the Commons, for a term equal to that of the original chamber. Bill C-60 therefore called upon the chambers to so amend the Constitution, without constitutional agreement and without previous agreement with our federated provinces, so that the new chamber to replace the current Senate would have powers reduced to that of a 60-day provisional veto, an extended jurisdiction to include the approval of certain nominations, and a special role in respect of proposals of special language import.

I doubt that our Parliament now has the mandate and authority to make those amendments unilaterally, without constitutional approval of its federated members. To me, this seems somewhat unreasonable. In 1972, the Senate participated in the drafting of the report by the joint committee on the Constitution. The Senate then made excellent recommendations, which unfortunately it did not have the authority to implement and ultimately they failed to get constitutional approval from federated members. At any rate, the central government did not act on the committee's recommendations. We know full well why.

The Special Senate Committee is of the view that:

Any proposal to deal with the structure and function of a second chamber in a federal parliamentary system must take account of certain basic principles. It is the basic flaw of Bill C-60 that it uses the single test of regional representation. Any such proposal should decide whether the chamber should be elective or appointive. It should consider its role in a system of checks and balances including a check on the executive. It should consider the importance of revision of legislation. It should assess the value of using the chamber to articulate regional interests and the interests of minority groups without frustrating the parliamentary process. It should evaluate its role in the investigation of and report upon issues of great national concern.

I for one am in total agreement with the remarks made by the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution. I feel this is a matter of common sense.

[English]

I believe that this proposed House of the Federation, if it ever comes into being, should be, for the greater part at least, appointed. It should not be responsible to an electorate. Appointment to office, as the first report of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution of Canada states, is not foreign to our public institutions. Indeed, it is used in the case of the judiciary, the public service, crown corporations and, after elections, cabinet appointments. Such appointments are not favours, and they are not made by the party in office to reward the faithful. It goes beyond such reasoning. The appointment of senators on the other side illustrates that, even if such appointments are not made too often.

With good reason, the first report of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution questions how the proposed House of the Federation could function as the main element in a system of checks and balances, including a check on the executive. The report says:

Should the House of the Federation, as projected in Bill C-60, reject or delay or amend legislation in a manner unacceptable to government policy, the bill in question could be presented for Royal Assent within months, without its concurrence and in most cases without reconsideration by the Commons. In this way, the will of the executive, exercised through its whips, would prevail regardless of the views held in the second chamber. The committee feels that Canadians would not want to vest such absolute power in the executive.

The existence of a second chamber, the Senate, with a meaningful veto or suspensive power, should be the brake on autocratic behaviour by government.

The report of the Special Senate Committee also points out:

A House made up of members owing allegiance to so many political leaders and characterized by fragmentation of political opinion could well be an obstructive force in the legislative process, even within the time allowed by the proposed limited power to delay passage of legislation.

I do not believe the House of the Federation proposed by Bill C-60 would be able to promote either regional interests or the interests of minority groups without frustrating the parliamentary process. Our existing parliamentary institutions have good facilities for the expression of the views of each and every region of our nation, and representatives from these regions have historically been the faithful spokesmen for our provinces and regions. There is now good protection of regional interests. The Prime Minister has only to keep on appointing good candidates to either side of the Senate from the regions whenever there are vacancies. The trouble does not lie there at all.

There is a further all-round good protection in our present system since, whenever possible, cabinet ministers are selected on a regional basis. Caucuses of the federal parties are organized on national and regional bases. Senators, according to the British North America Act, should really be appointed on a regional basis. In my opinion, the Senate, with all its faults, is greatly superior to a House of the Federation, such as proposed by Bill C-60, whichever way we look at it.

Bill C-60, which was tabled during the last session, required provincial appointments to the House of the Federation to be made anew after each provincial election. This would prevent any form of stability. It is hard to believe that a House of the Federation, as conceived by Bill C-60 of the last session, could effectively carry out an investigative role in matters of national concern. Having regard for the method of selecting members of the House of the Federation, and their brief mandate, the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution is, I believe, absolutely right in its assessment of the value of such a proposed controversial upper house to replace the Senate.

In the Senate now our field of responsibilities could be further extended by our actively encouraging, in our system of committee studies and inquiries, the direct participation of our fellow Canadians on subjects of national concern. This could also contribute to an appreciable improvement in the working methods of Parliament. This can be done. I believe, by the Senate itself, without outside interference, at any time it chooses. We should not allow the government to impose on us the subjects to be studied. In these matters the Senate should be fully independent and aloof, and the sole evaluator of their order of priority.

While I agree that our Constitution can and should be streamlined, the Senate need not be downgraded in the process, as some have proposed. Other countries have successfully improved their constitutions, and we can improve ours, particularly by giving it the legal and constitutional streamlining that will enable the Senate to do an even better job than it now does. However, the abolition of the Senate, and its replacement by a so-called House of the Federation, would be a great basic mistake. In my opinion, it would downgrade the quality of our Parliament, its upper chamber and our legislative efficiency. For the good of Canada, I hope this does not come to pass.

Before concluding, I want to point out the absence of provisions for formal national referendums, when required, on questions affecting the nation. The referring of a bill or act of the legislature to the people for decision by vote has, I believe, become important for a modern government. I believe the provinces are agreed on this.

I believe, along with many others, that the central government is making a wrong move by taking a unilateral approach to amendment of the Constitution as proposed in Bill C-60 with respect to the Supreme Court, the Senate, and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Constitution should not be amended unilaterally. It should never be amended without agreement between the central government and the provincial governments. The central government and the provincial governments should approve all changes in the structure of the Supreme Court, the abolition of the Senate, and the restatement of our rights and freedoms. To me, Bill C-60, as originally tabled in the last session and finally shelved, was in no way constitutionally acceptable, the majority of the provinces having repudiated it.

Claude Ryan, the Quebec Liberal leader, is right when he says:

Canadians of every language, occupation, region and political allegiance should participate fully in what is really the fraternal national project of updating the Constitution.

In spite of the difficulties that have to be faced, the best way to amend the Constitution is still through a constitutional convention that should be called for the purpose of giving it the legal face-lifting it needs and deserves and can be given.

We can surely at least amend the Constitution with respect to those matters on which there is general consensus and agreement, and there are many of them. I do not believe it would be that disastrous to leave the controversial proposed amendments aside for the immediate present, so that we can concentrate on improving the economy of the nation, which I believe has priority number one at this time. It seems to me to be too much to tackle controversial amendments to the Constitution while we must, at the same time, weather one of the severest economic storms of this century, and while the nation is facing severe internal dissension. I believe the country is also of that opinion.

I believe we should rename the committees of the Senate, and call them commissions of the Senate. Possibly we can take this initiative ourselves. It would be more in line with the inquiries, the studies and the investigations we are now making. It would be more realistic insofar as the general public is concerned. I believe it would add to the importance, the prestige, and the usefulness of the Senate and its recommendations. The time has also come to recognize in our Constitution the civil right of access to official documents. Access to them now is too restricted, which reflects in our time thinking which is obsolete.

On motion of Senator Bell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne) be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Lang on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, January 30, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to give you a brief summary of the work for next week.

There appears to be little prospect of any legislation reaching us; however, the committee schedule will be heavy, and we propose that the Senate do not sit on Wednesday so that committees can meet all day.

The committee schedule for next week is as follows:

On Tuesday the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will hold a meeting at 10 a.m. on Bill S-6, the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, and the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 2 p.m.. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will hold an in camera meeting at 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-9, the Canada Referendum Act. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will also meet at 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1978.

On Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. and 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-15, and the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline will meet at 2 p.m. There exists the possibility that the Transport and Communications Committee will also meet on Wednesday to consider Bill S-6, the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979.

On Thursday the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 9.30 a.m., and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will also meet at 9.30 a.m. to continue its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-15. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m., and the Internal Economy Committee will hold an in camera meeting at the same time.

In the Senate we shall continue the debate on the report of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution and the report of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline. I also understand that it is the intention of Senator van Roggen to proceed with his inquiry on the order paper, which is to call the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs respecting Canada's trade relations with the United States.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS AS OBSERVERS—QUESTION

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in connection with the federal-provincial conference to be held on February 5 and 6 next.

My question relates to the provisions to be made for the attendance of senators at that conference. By way of background, it took quite a bit of arranging for senators to gain access to the Federal-Provincial Conference of First Ministers on the Constitution in October. As for the Federal-Provincial Conference on the Economy that followed in late November, there was no provision for the attendance of honourable senators as observers.

Knowing how vitally concerned the government is that the provinces have more rapport with the central government and input into its policies, I am confident that some sort of arrangement will be made for the attendance of honourable senators at that forthcoming conference. It would also be helpful if we could be provided with a copy of the agenda in advance of the meeting.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, an inquiry has gone forth in that respect. It is hoped that adequate arrangements will be made for the attendance of honourable senators at the conference.

TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

TABLING OF REPORT—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that my information is that the Report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity has been tabled in the other place, and in fact has been widely distributed there since this morning, can the Leader of the Government inform the Senate as to why that report was not tabled in the Senate today and why those of us on this side at least were not provided with a copy of that report?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity will be tabled in the other place at approximately 3 o'clock this afternoon. If we are sitting at that time, the report will be tabled simultaneously in this chamber. I can inform honourable senators that as yet I have not received a formal copy of the report.

Senator Flynn: It seems to me essential that the Leader of the Government should receive an advance copy of the report.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, if I may interject, I asked my secretary this morning if she would try to get me a copy of the report, and a copy was on my desk when I came back from lunch.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps my secretary is not as efficient as yours, but I don't know through which door your secretary went.

Senator Goldenberg: I was in no way reflecting on the efficiency of the excellent secretary of the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: I hope not. She would not like it.

AGRICULTURE

OFF-TRACK BETTING—QUESTION

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Has he received an official request from the Department of Agriculture with respect to referring the question of off-track betting to a committee of the Senate?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the Minister of Agriculture has requested the Senate to consider the possibility of undertaking a study of off-track betting. I indicated to the minister that I would do my best to have a resolution introduced in the Senate, and honourable senators can then determine whether they wish to have this subject discussed by one of our appropriate committees.

● (1410)

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the leader. With respect to the suggestion that the Senate make a study of off-track betting, will he give consideration to whether it might not best be handled by a special committee rather than by one of our existing committees? I ask this because there is already evidence that many witnesses will wish to be heard, and so it might be more appropriate to the efficiency of the operations of other committees if a separate committee dealt with this subject.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that suggestion is very much appreciated. It may well be that the question should be referred to a special committee or to a subcommittee of one of our standing committees. However, I shall be pleased to discuss the matter with the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy.

I may say that in requesting that the Senate look into this question, the Honourable Eugene Whelan made a special point of stating that the Senate had done outstanding work in its committee deliberations in the past two or three years. He made specific reference to the Kent County report, and to a number of other Senate studies. I want to say how much we appreciate the praise that has been directed to the Senate by the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Flynn: Did the Minister of Agriculture, or any other minister, praise the Senate for the work it did on Bill C-14 in the Senate chamber?

An Hon. Senator: Yes.

Senator Perrault: That meritorious situation was so self-evident that it may not have required special note.

Senator Flynn: I agree with you. It was self-evident.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: And Senator van Roggen was one of the architects of the job done on that occasion.

Senator van Roggen: What is the Leader of the Opposition accusing me of now?

Senator Flynn: I am saying that you were one of the architects of the good work done on Bill C-14 on December 21 and 22.

Senator van Roggen: That was before Christmas. I enjoyed a lovely Christmas since then.

FISHERIES

REPORT OF SINCLAIR COMMISSION—QUESTION

Senator Williams: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I understand that the report of the Sinclair Commission, which has been studying licensing with respect to fisheries in the Pacific region, has been in the hands of the government for some time. When will that report be made available to the public?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING PARLIAMENT—QUESTION

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government a question. It would appear from the news reports on the radio today that Mr. Robarts and Mr. Pepin, the Co-chairmen of the Task Force on Canadian Unity, have become authorities on the reform of both the House of Commons and the Senate, or at least they consider themselves to be so.

Can the leader give us any indication of any evidence that may have been taken at any time by that commission from any members of either house?

Senator Perrault: First, it seems to me that it may be of value for all honourable senators to read the report in its entirety before offering any comment about the merit of any of the proposals contained in it. Secondly, the government does not necessarily feel bound by any of the recommendations of the Unity Task Force, just as no government is bound by recommendations which may ensue from royal commissions and white papers from time to time. Thirdly, as Leader of the Government in the Senate I have received no direct request from the Unity Task Force for any special meetings of senators, or any special meetings in the Senate, in order to determine some of the views of honourable senators, although I understand that some senators testified before the committee.

In this regard I dare say that the Senate has spent as many or more hours studying the question of Senate reform than the Unity Task Force because of the time limitations imposed on the Unity Task Force and the necessarily wider range of its terms of reference.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Perhaps by way of a question of privilege I can participate in this discussion.

I might say that I appeared before the Unity Task Force when it was in Halifax, but the question of reform of the Senate was certainly not discussed in my presence, so it would be a mistake to say that I offered any opinion on either the House of Commons or the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Then I understand that no questions were put to Senator Smith with respect to his views on reform of the Senate.

Senator Grosart: That is what he said.

Senator Smith (Colchester): There were none that I recall.

Senator Robichaud: I can say the same thing because I attended the whole session in Moncton and no reference was ever made to the House of Commons or to the Senate and no question was asked, so I do not know how they reached those conclusions. They have not made a study such as we have.

[Senator Williams.]

[Translation]

Senator Langlois: What is the point? They know it all.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall withhold any detailed comment on this Unity Task Force report until I have an opportunity to read it at some length. That may take a few days. After honourable senators have had a chance to study the contents of the report, perhaps they would consider a debate in the chamber on the Unity Task Force report. That is something that can be discussed.

Senator Flynn: Apparently Senator Robichaud has already formed an opinion.

TRANSPORT

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY—TIRE PRESSURE SURVEY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: I have a reply to a question put by Senator Smith (Colchester) on December 12 last with regard to tire inflation. He asked whether the government had authorized a survey or study to ascertain whether the owners of Canadian motor vehicles are correctly inflating their tires.

Following the investigation of over 600 complaints of alleged tire defects in 1978, Transport Canada investigators became aware that many of the tire failures had been associated with the underinflation of the tire. Underinflation leads to the irreversible deterioration of the tire which, in turn, leads to tire failure. Correct tire pressure contributes to improved safety and vehicle control as well as better gas mileage and longer tire life.

To provide a clearer understanding of this problem a nationwide survey of automobile tire pressures was conducted in early December. The survey and the coding of the data, which is to be completed by early January—and presumably that has been completed by now—will cost $25,000. The findings will be used to assess the need for countermeasures, possibly under the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Act.

The field survey of 750 households, which included an interview with the principal driver of the car and a check of the air pressure in the tires, was completed before Christmas. The data for all regions in Canada are now being brought together, coded and tabulated. A report on the findings is expected by the end of January 1979.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEARCH FOR MISSING VESSEL—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question put by Senator Marshall on December 20, 1978. Senator Marshall asked that the minister order an inquiry into the loss of the fishing vessel Barra Cudina.

I can inform the Senate that a preliminary inquiry was carried out and that at the date when this material became available to me the minister's decision on whether or not to order a public inquiry had not been taken, but was expected shortly. I cannot say whether there has been an announcement in recent hours.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE ON MAIL TO ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL OVERSEAS

Senator Perrault: Senator Rowe asked if the Leader of the Government knew whether the use of the social insurance number in respect of—

Senator Asselin: He is not here.

Senator Perrault: Senator Asselin has made a valid observation. In view of the fact that Senator Rowe is not here, and this is a technical matter, perhaps we can leave it until he is present.

● (1420)

Senator Flynn: You could not reply to the question posed by Senator Austin because he is not here today.

Senator Perrault: He was in his place.

Senator Flynn: Yesterday you said he is usually here.

USE FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Senator Smith (Colchester), Senator Flynn and Senator Guay asked questions with respect to the use of social insurance numbers for income tax purposes. They are in their places today, so they are in a position to challenge any of the answers I shall provide to their questions.

The requirement to withhold 25 per cent of the amount payable on the cashing of Canada Savings Bonds when a social insurance number is not supplied is a particular application of a general provision of the Income Tax Act found in section 234(5). Under the heading "Withholding," it states:

Where an amount is to be paid . . . to a resident of Canada . . . in circumstances where an ownership certificate . . . is required to be completed and the ownership certificate does not contain a Social Insurance Number . . . the person paying the amount shall deduct or withhold an amount equal to 25 per cent thereof and shall forthwith remit that amount to the Receiver General of Canada on account of the individual's tax for the year—

If the tax owed by the individual is less than the amount withheld, the individual can claim a refund of the difference.

The suggestion by Senator Smith (Colchester) that there is a breach of the contract under which the bonds are sold is not correct, any more than it would be correct in the case in which an individual is hired for a job at a specific salary from which the employer is required to withhold income tax, Canada Pension Plan, Unemployment Insurance, Hospital Insurance and other levies.

The Leader of the Opposition asked a question concerning stolen bonds and the government's sharing in the "fruits of the theft." I think those are the words the Leader of the Opposition employed. Everyone relies on the banking system to establish the proper identity of individuals in connection with countless millions of other financial transactions, and the fact that the person cashing interest coupons has to identify himself or herself is considered an adequate protection against any significant abuse.

There was a suggestion in one question posed by Senator Guay that the proceeds from the sale of a bond are subject to the 25 per cent deduction when a social insurance number is not provided. Only the interest is subject to the deduction and, as was said, the amount deducted is refundable if not required to discharge a tax liability.

REQUIREMENT FOR DOMESTIC AIR CHARTER BOOKINGS— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On December 14 Senator Roblin asked the following question:

Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government whether he is aware that another one of these unusual uses for the social insurance number has surfaced. The Canadian Transport Commission now requires that all domestic air charter passengers provide their social insurance number or other valid identification number if they wish to use the advanced booking system.

The regulations governing Advance Booking Charters are contained in the Air Carrier Regulations issued by the Canadian Transport Commission pursuant to its legislative authority contained in the Aeronautics Act and National Transportation Act. The Air Carrier Regulations provide, inter alia:

43.56—At least thirty days prior to the date of departure of the outgoing portion of an ABC (domestic), the air carrier responsible for that portion shall file with the Secretary . . .

(d) a list obtained from each charterer . . .

(ii) identifying each passenger by surname, given names, address and social insurance number or number of another valid identification document, and showing, in alphabetical order, all passengers on the outgoing and return portions of the ABC (domestic) in accordance with their respective reservations.

In order to ensure that only those persons who have met the advance booking criteria are allowed to travel on ABCs, a passenger list for each ABC flight is required to be filed with the Air Transport Committee of the CTC 30 days before the date of the flight. Positive identification of passengers is achieved by having an identification document number included together with the passenger's address.

In the case of international ABCs, a passport number is usually quoted, but in many cases passengers have supplied their social insurance number in lieu, as they may not have obtained a passport 30 days before flight, or may be travelling to a destination country which does not require a passport. Consequently, the social insurance number was considered acceptable as a form of identification, and was used as an example in the regulations respecting domestic ABCs. It is not mandatory in the sense that other forms of identification are equally acceptable. Birth certificates, drivers' licences, passports or other government-issued identification documents would serve equally well.

It has been the committee's experience that the travelling public has voluntarily provided social insurance numbers as identification for international ABCs where passports were not in hand at the time required. It was only a logical extension of this practice for domestic ABCs, and the option of using other identification is available to the public. The commission however recognizes the sensitivity of specific reference to the provision of social insurance numbers, and is in the process of amending the Air Carrier Regulations to delete this specific reference.

I am sure this information will be of substantial interest to Senator Roblin.

Senator Flynn: I have a supplementary question. If identification were supplied by means of a birth certificate alone, would that be considered valid identification? I do not think I would recognize the Leader of the Government on the basis of his birth certificate alone.

Senator Perrault: This is one of the documents which, in the opinion of the authorities, at least, serves equally as well as a social insurance number. Senator Flynn is entitled to his opinion as to whether or not it is, in fact, as valid.

Senator Guay: My recollection is that I directed a supplementary question to the leader to determine whether the taxpayer would be entitled to a refund of this 25 per cent withholding penalty if he produced a social insurance number at a later date.

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: That is obvious. If he can be identified later on, there is no problem. I asked how much of the unclaimed money the government had been able to retain. I did not receive an answer to that question.

Senator Perrault: As I recall, that information was provided earlier.

Senator Flynn: You said that information was not available. If the money is in the government's hands, it must be accounted for somewhere.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Guay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Joseph Guay: Honourable senators, I wish to thank you for giving me the opportunity of making a few comments on the proceedings of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

[English]

Since I have a relatively short period of time in which to discuss this complicated matter of expropriation, I wish to make just a few general remarks regarding the committee's approach before making some specific points about which I am particularly concerned.

By way of setting down my frame of reference permit me to reiterate the committee's broad goals, which can be summarized as being an attempt to reform the expropriation rules under the National Energy Board Act. These rules have not been revised for years, and have, therefore, fallen behind provincial expropriation laws. This reform has as its basic thrust the desire of our committee to provide a fair method of taking land from owners within a framework which provides for their protection. The goals are as commendable as they are difficult to achieve and, to this end, I should like to caution this chamber against haste. The National Energy Board Act has stood for some 20 years, and we in the Senate must bear in mind that our own efforts may also stand for some 20 years to come and may affect some hundreds or thousands of landowners. I certainly feel that it is better for us to work well than to work too quickly.

It is also important that our reforms not only do justice for the landowners involved, but that they provide this justice in a way which would allow the landowner to feel that the system, as we shall set it up, will be responsive to his concerns. The landowner must not only have justice done to him, but he must also know that he has had some effective input into the final just result.

Now that I have made my few general comments, let me remind my colleagues that the fundamentals of expropriation are as simple as they are painful. Expropriation, at its simplest, consists of taking land for worthy national or community projects from unwilling owners, and of setting an appropriate level and form of compensation for that taking. To the extent that the owners are unwilling it is important that the expropriation be as painless and as fair as possible.

Keeping that in mind, I have looked at the period of time allowed for an appeal from a decision of the arbitration board in our proposed section 75(9), and I see that it is to be one month. I feel that is too short a period of time. Surely, in a situation as difficult and complex as an expropriation, we can see our way clear to allowing the landowner at least 60 days, or, in my humble opinion, 40 working days, so that he may consult his advisers and they are enabled to prepare his case properly. I feel that this is not an unduly long period of time because I know how lawyers feel about time restrictions. The landowner may take as long as 30 days before he makes up his mind to appeal. I hope, therefore, that the committee will give consideration to my request.

I should like to quote a newspaper article, copies of which all members of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline have received. It is an article written by Rudy Platiel which appeared, in the Globe and Mail of January 4, 1979, and it speaks for itself. It is headed "Farmers win oil pipeline damage suit," and it states:

In a decision that could drastically alter the handling of future pipeline construction, a County Court judge has awarded three London area farmers a total of $119,387.18 in compensation for agriculture damage.

Middlesex County Judge Gordon Killeen based the bulk of his award on the entire replacement of topsoil over a pipeline built through the farmers' land.

In handing down his judgment last week, Judge Killeen said the case would probably not have occurred if Inter-provincial Pipe Line Ltd. had followed the 1974 recommendations made by a consultant hired by one of the farmers.

Geoffrey Bladon, lawyer for two of the farmers, Peter Lewington and Stuart O'Neill, said the award is the largest he knows of in such cases . . .

But Judge Killeen accepted the evidence of consultants and the three farmers that for all practical purposes the soil productivity is permanently damaged and the only alternative is to replace the topsoil completely.

I am only reading part of the article, which goes on to say:

Judge Killeen said he found the major thrust of the farmers' complaints have been substantiated "overwhelmingly on the evidence."

He said a report prepared by planning expert Norman Pearson, hired by Mr. Lewington, and presented to the 1974 National Energy Board pipeline hearings in Ottawa, should be "considered in retrospect of a prescient character in that it zeroed in on all of the major issues put before me . . ."

In the last part of the article it is stated that Mr. Pearson gave evidence as follows:

He told the court that stripping and stockpiling of topsoil in 1976 was "done negligently" with the result that the soil in the pipeline right-of-way was "virtually sterilized."

Judge Killeen awarded the damages I mentioned before.

The article further states:

IPL officials have said that no more than about 12 of some 2,200 landowners whose property was crossed are "giving the company trouble" over settlements.

This comment relates directly to some of the matters which I wish to raise today. Many of these farmers do not have the money—which I think is a most important consideration—to pay for such law suits. They are reluctant to place their savings at the mercy of lawyers who represent them in cases like that, particularly when they are fighting governments or large companies. It is for these reasons that there were so few who appealed or complained. The land was taken from them, and that was it.

Once the pipeline is built, it will be there for many years. Surely we can allow the landowner a few extra days in which to decide whether to appeal, and to be prepared when his appeal is heard. We wish the expropriation rules to be fair and efficient, but we do not want them to completely bulldoze the landowner who, we must remember, has many normal, human concerns to occupy his time and thoughts.

Proceeding from this point, let me make one other related point. We have incorporated into our proposal the requirement that the board send out a notice and a certified copy of its decision to both the company and the landowner. I feel that we should require the important time limit and the effect of the board's decision to be set out in that notice in plain and simple language. Such a critical decision should not be conveyed in legal words which confuse a landowner who is almost certain to be less sophisticated than a large pipeline company.

Following the expropriation, there then comes the matter of setting the amount and form of compensation. The amount of compensation should, so far as possible, be determined by agreement between the parties. The compensation, however, may take one of three forms. First, it could be a once-only lump sum payment. That form of compensation is simple and efficient to administer, but, over the long term, very often unfair.

There may be, for example, a continuing loss of value over the years. Such a loss would not be easily calculated at the time of expropriation. The landowner might also incur unforeseen costs as a result of future drainage and access problems arising out of the pipeline traversing his lands. Also, should there be environmental damage as a result of a pipeline accident, all lands through which pipelines have been constructed would be devalued. One must remember that reports of such an accident would receive wide circulation, and could cause uneasiness among those living or working near a large diameter pipeline.

We had representatives of the Canadian Petroleum Association before the committee yesterday, and I took the opportunity at that time to inquire as to what might happen were they to construct a pipeline through or close to a subdivision. Their answer was that a pipeline could be built through a subdivision provided they had an extra 30 feet on each side of their normal right-of-way. That causes me some concern. One can well imagine the damage and injuries that would result in the event of an explosion or other accident involving a pipeline running through a subdivision.

While I am on the subject of damages, I should like to quote from a letter from a farmer whose land was expropriated for the construction of a pipeline and on whose land an accident occurred. The letter reads, in part, as follows:

A few years ago, a pipeline northwest of my location, exploded and burnt a farmer's combine. Luckily, no one was injured. He happened to be harvesting on the right-of-way just at the time. The combine was replaced by the oil company concerned but he was told the oil company did it as an act of kindness and was not compelled to replace any property damaged.

He goes on to say:

If this is the situation and should there ever be a similar incident on my farm concerning any part of my family or property, what protection, if any, do I have? If suddenly I am faced with the fact that I might have to replace the entire cost of damaged property at today's prices, I would be forced to cease farming operations; especially when you consider a combine at the cost of $20,000 to $50,000 or even one cow at $500 to $1,000, not to mention the unreplaceable.

He goes on to raise the question of where responsibility would lie in the event that an explosion on his property damaged his neighbour's property.

The committee will have to deal with these questions, and certainly the pipeline companies will have to spell out in clear terms what their intentions and policies are in this respect.

So, it is clear that the lump sum form of payment has its drawbacks. The second form compensation might take is that of an annually negotiated payment. This form of compensation would probably be unacceptable on a large scale since it would involve the pipeline company engaging in negotiations every year with a large number of landowners. It would probably also require a large and expensive bureaucracy on the part of both the National Energy Board and the pipeline company to make it work.

It is quite an easy matter to find out who are the owners of a given piece of property. An inquiry directed to the municipal authorities will provide the necessary information in fairly short order. Any contention by the pipeline companies that it would be a burdensome task to determine who the property owners are from time to time should be disregarded.

Perhaps the most acceptable form of compensation is that suggested by the Canadian Petroleum Association in its brief, that being compensation in the form of annual payments revised every five years or so. This form of payment has the advantage of flexibility as well as providing some stability over a period of time. It might be the acceptable compromise solution to the problem of finding an acceptable form of compensation that is both fair to the landowner and easy to administer.

In closing, let me reiterate that we must amend section 75(1) of the National Energy Board Act. A revised expropriation appeal procedure must be fair and accessible to both large and small landowners, and, in order to be fair and accessible, it must be inexpensive. The cost of expert help may deter landowners from attempting to voice their concern in the light of what they may view as the futility of taking on big business and big government. Surely, it is up to the Senate of Canada, and in this case the Northern Pipeline Committee, to concern itself with providing the greatest possible protection for landowners, especially in those cases where the government provides assistance to the private sector in expropriating lands for necessary projects—and there is no question that this is such a case.

I thank honourable senators for this opportunity to say a few words. I would not want my comments in this debate to be regarded as my maiden speech in the Senate. I hope I will be given the opportunity of making my maiden speech at a later date.

Senator Barrow: I wonder if I might ask the honourable senator a question. Is there not now a provision under the Expropriation Act for the landowner to recover his full legal costs in connection with the filing of an appeal and contesting an expropriation?

Senator Guay: I do not believe so, senator. I am not an expert in this area, but certainly I do not believe that is the case under the act with which we are concerned in this case. I want to make sure that the landowners in this case do have that protection, and I believe it is the responsibility of the Senate to provide it.

Senator Flynn: Has the committee considered the federal expropriation law in respect of this situation? You referred to the expropriation provisions under the National Energy Board Act, and I agree with you that those provisions may be deficient in some respects.

Senator Guay: The expropriation laws are behind the times. Most of the provinces have updated their respective expropriation acts, and the National Energy Board Act is not bad at all. It was last amended in respect of its expropriation provisions in 1973 or 1974. The chairman of the committee may be able to provide more details in that respect.

It is my view that section 75(1) of the National Energy Board Act requires amendment. The chairman of the committee, in fact, has already done a substantial amount of work on such an amendment, and I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate him on his work to date. I am a latecomer to the committee, but it is obvious that both the chairman and the committee have done a marvellous job to date. I can assure honourable senators that the committee is in good hands, and no doubt when the committee reports it will provide honourable senators with all the details pertaining to this matter.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 30, at 8 p.m.

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED GARNISHEEING OF CHILD TAX CREDIT—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate about a very serious matter. It has to do with the objectives of Bill C-10, the act to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

I ask the leader if he would seek clarification to confirm something concerning the benefit of $200 per child directed to the mothers in lower income categories. In cases of where, for justifiable reasons, families may have fallen behind in their income tax obligations, is it the intention of the government, as was brought to my attention just a few hours ago, to garnishee those amounts to which mothers are entitled to meet the amounts owed by the parents. I think this is a very serious situation, and one which should be corrected. We could serve a useful purpose by clarifying that.

An Hon. Senator: Shameful!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as this is the first occasion on which I have heard about this alleged situation, I shall take the question as notice.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I would like to rise on a point of order to explain the case. It has to do with a family on a very low income of some $400 a month. When one takes out the rent and other obligations of $150, and understands that the mother has two anemic children who have to be provided with foods that are necessary for their well-being, it is clear that such a matter should be considered seriously. I know that the leader, in his sympathetic consideration, will do that, and we will have a quicker answer than could be obtained through the normal procedures of the House of Commons.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this government has always demonstrated a great compassion for the lesser privileged in our society. I would appreciate it very much if the honourable senator would provide me this evening with the details of this case, including the name and address of the party in this distressed condition. On receipt of that information, I will personally bring the matter to the attention of the minister concerned to see what can be done to alleviate the problem.

THE ECONOMY

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROLS—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the matter of foreign exchange controls.

In view of the fact that the current account deficit for 1978 was approximately $4.5 billion, and in view of the fact that current estimates show a similar deficit for 1979, what consideration has the government given to imposing foreign exchange controls on the Canadian economy as a move to support this immense deficit?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin, with his extensive background as premier of one of Canada's great provinces, understands, of course, that the kind of information he seeks cannot be dispensed in random fashion, either in this house or the other place, because of its vast economic ramifications. However, an inquiry will go forth to the Department of Finance and that information which is in the public interest and which can be dispensed prudently, will certainly be made available.

Senator Roblin: By way of a supplementary, if it is not the intention of this government to support the current account deficit in the fashion described, what other measures does the government have in mind in this respect?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators can take great heart, I think, from the—Senator Smith (Colchester): The drop of the dollar to 83 cents U.S.!

Senator Perrault: —great improvement in the Canadian economy in recent weeks and the excellent showing Canadian merchandise is making in export sales.

Honourable senators, I am sure, are aware of the fact that one of the reasons for the current foreign exchange situation is the fact that many Canadians, enjoying the fruits of a certain degree of prosperity, are able to take extended vacations abroad. That is one of the sources of our exchange problems, and I am sure the honourable senator is aware of that. On the merchandise trade side, great progress is being made.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Blame it on anybody but the government.

Senator Roblin: I certainly subscribe to that remark. Has my honourable friend any comment to make on the fact that in the other place last week the Minister of Finance dealt with the same question by saying—and I think I am quoting him accurately—"We have no intention at this time to impose controls on foreign exchanges in Canada"? Would that not constitute clear warning to all of us that controls will be considered at some time?

● (2015)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it seems to me that that is precisely the kind of reply a responsible Minister of Finance should have given in the other place. I think that if one studies the records of the great province of Manitoba, one will see that there have been no occasions when the former premier of that province has ever announced in advance any budget proposals or any financial proposals.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am glad that my activities in another place should have received such close scrutiny on the part of my honourable friend. I feel flattered. I did not know he took such a close interest. But I can tell him that I do not think I was ever guilty of hedging my bets in quite such a blatant fashion as does the statement which I have just quoted.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEAL HUNT PROTEST ACTIVITIES—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could direct another question to the Leader of the Government. This has to do with a question I raised a couple of months ago with regard to an American by the name of Cleveland Amory whose activities include "conning" innocent people into giving money to protest against the seal hunt in Newfoundland. Could the leader find out and report to this chamber in the near future whether indeed a ship known as the Sea Shepherd has been granted a licence by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment to attend the seal hunt when the intention is to interfere with other ships that are legitimately prosecuting the seal hunt?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no information on that question. It must be taken as notice. However, the Government of Canada has never engaged in illegal activities designed to disrupt the seal hunt.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I would inform the Leader of the Government that I am in full accord with the direction of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment with regard to the seal hunt. I know that he would want this brought to his attention, and I also know he will direct the corrective action which is necessary.

TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In a joint report to the government in 1972, a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate recommended a number of constitutional changes. I remember that at the time some of those recommendations did not seem to please the government. The joint report was therefore shelved without having been discussed in either the Senate or the House of Commons.

In view of the differences that seem to exist between the opinions expressed by the Prime Minister and the conclusions of the report, especially with regard to the linguistic rights of minorities, I should like to find out from the Leader of the Government whether the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity stands a chance of meeting the same fate as the joint report of the Senate and the House of Commons in 1972, that is, of being shelved and never heard of again?

[English]

Senator Perrault: I am sure that all honourable senators are aware that this government, like previous governments, authorizes from time to time the formation of royal commissions and other studies to assist in policy development. The recent report that has been issued, a copy of which was tabled in the Senate this evening, together with the report referred to by Senator Asselin, forms part of the resource material that will be available to the government when the time arrives for finalization of certain constitutional proposals.

No government is required to follow implicitly the recommendations of any royal commission or any study authorized by Parliament. Honourable senators are aware of that. The consensus is that the 1972 report was an excellent report and has been of real use to the government in its initiatives toward constitutional evolution in this country. The recent report, which is now being read by parliamentarians and Canadians from coast to coast, is another useful and interesting document.

• (2020)

Senator Flynn: A slow ship to China.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: A supplementary question. Does the Leader of the Government not feel that if the government had started implementing some of the recommendations contained in the 1972 joint Senate and Commons report, Canada might not be going through the present constitutional crisis, since some changes would already have been made and the Canadian people might be satisfied with them, so that the present crisis would not exist?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware that the whole process of constitutional reform is a difficult one, and in some ways it has followed a tortuous path. Instant implementation has never been anticipated for any constitutional reform proposals at any time.

And surely it is not for me to speculate on what might have been. Our task, given the facts as they exist in 1979, is to proceed to bring about those changes which will clearly lead to a more effective Confederation. That is the task to which we must dedicate ourselves.

TERMS OF REFERENCE—QUESTION

Senator Olson: In view of the allegation, at least, if not the fact, that the first report of the Task Force on Unity—

Senator Flynn: The last report.

Senator Olson: Well, I understand there are going to be some more, so I am referring to it as the first. In view of the fact that this was published earlier than was announced or anticipated, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can tell us whether this indicates that the First Ministers' Conference will be focusing its attention on some of those matters raised—and the one that I am particularly interested in is the distribution of some of the revenue from resources among the provinces.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it can be expected that the Conference of First Ministers, which will take place early in February, will focus on some of the concerns expressed in that task force report.

The report, A Future Together, expresses the task force's belief that a serious situation exists in the country. That appears to be one of the reasons why the production date of this first report was advanced. The task force members perceive a "crisis" situation, as they describe it in the opening pages.

No one really knows what is going to evolve from the meetings of first ministers. However, as I have said, one would expect that the task force report, or parts of it, would be discussed either formally or informally at the meetings.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I wonder if the government leader can advise whether or not the terms of reference of the task force included the redistribution of natural resource revenue? If it did, I think it is news to those people who appeared at the hearings; yet the task force has come up with a recommendation regarding some fairly massive redistribution of natural resource revenue. I am curious as to whether or not that was contained in the terms of reference, so that people could have been expected to comment on it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, references to resources were not specifically contained in the terms of reference of the task force. Is the honourable senator suggesting that members of the task force should have met with people in the resource industry to obtain their opinions?

Senator Olson: No. The suggestion that I am making is that if those people who appeared before the task force hearings across the country had known that this redistribution was going to be taken into account, surely they would have had some recommendations to make and some opinions to express respecting that matter. The task force has now come up with a fairly specific recommendation, and it seems to me that it was based on something other than what the witnesses—if you want to call them witnesses—were invited to comment on.

Senator Perrault: Equally it has been said by some senators that had they been aware that the task force planned to advance such specific recommendations about the future of the Senate, they would have sought opportunities to place their views before the Task Force on Canadian Unity. Some have suggested that the task force might have sought an opportunity to meet with parliamentarians here in Ottawa so that senators and members of the other place—those with a working knowledge of Parliament and those here concerned with Senate reform—might have had an opportunity for input before the report was issued.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE ON MAIL TO ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL OVERSEAS

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have one reply to a question which is of long standing. With the indulgence of honourable senators, I will give it now. This dates back to November 30, and relates to SIN and the armed forces. I refer, of course, to social insurance numbers. The question was asked by the Honourable Senator Rowe.

PUBLIC WORKS AND URBAN AFFAIRS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR HOUSING—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: The next reply is to a question regarding housing, which dates back to November 30 as well. This is a rather aged question.

An Hon. Senator: Aging?

Senator Perrault: Senator Marshall's question was as follows:

My question concerns low rental housing for veterans, and additional benefits provided veterans under the Assisted Home Ownership Program. These are important matters for veterans, so I would appreciate any information the leader can provide on this subject.

The reply is as follows:

With respect to low rental housing for veterans, an agreement between the Minister of Veterans Affairs and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was signed on August 30, 1976, and amended in July 1977. Under this agreement, the Minister of Veterans Affairs may approve grants, not exceeding 10 per cent of the capital costs, to non-profit corporations obtaining loans under section 15 of the National Housing Act, for the development of housing projects primarily, but not exclusively, for veterans. These grants would match the 10 per cent contribution available to non-profit corporations under section 15.1 of the NHA.

In May 1978, revisions to the non-profit housing program were announced by the federal government. Under the old program, the rent in such projects was subsidized for all occupants, regardless of income, by writing the interest rate down to 8 per cent and providing a 10 per cent capital grant. The new program introduces an interest reduction grant formula which may bring the effective interest rate down as low as 1 per cent. I think this indication of the government's concern is very good news for the vets. The formula thus provides more than twice the assistance available under the previous program and is directed toward those who need it most.

Beginning in 1979, it is expected that all non-profit groups will obtain their capital funding through approved lenders, and loans under section 15 will not be available. The Department of Veterans Affairs is reviewing the implications of its veterans housing assistance program in light of recent proposed amendments to the NHA. It is understood that pending the outcome of this review, grants from the Minister of Veterans Affairs for veterans' low rental housing projects, relating to loans obtained under section 15 of the NHA, are not available. The new non-profit program will, however, be of greater assistance to needy veterans and non-veterans alike, since the amount of subsidy available is greater than that available under the former program—the DVA grant and the NHA assistance combined.

Veterans may also obtain assistance under the Assisted Home Ownership Program. In addition to the CMHC assistance provided under the 1975 and 1976 AHOP program, the Department of Veterans Affairs also provided assistance of up to $600 to those veterans who qualified under the Veterans Land Act. The assistance from DVA continues to be available to qualified veterans who purchase unsold 1975 and 1976 AHOP units.

In May 1978, the corporation introduced the 1978 AHOP program. Assistance from DVA is not available to purchasers of units built under this program.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Explain.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators may read the answer in the Debates of the Senate tomorrow.

● (2030)

Senator Marshall: The answer is very ambiguous. My concern is that there would appear to be an intention on the part of the government to make that program obsolete. I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to ascertain the position of the government with respect to the two main features of the housing program for veterans, and whether it is the intention to support the very worthwhile project by the Newfoundland Provincial Command of Veterans to provide assistance for the repair of homes under the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program to which the government granted $38,000, did the survey, and then did nothing further. A period of two or three years has elapsed since that time.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is not long for those fellows.

FISHERIES

MACKEREL AND SQUID SALES—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 11—By Senator Marshall:

1. As a result of arrangements with Bulgaria to sell mackerel and squid caught by Atlantic provinces fishermen, Fisheries and Environment Canada News Release FMS-HQ-NR-16 dated 26 April, 1978, what is the tonnage and dollar value of the two species caught and sold in the province of Newfoundland by zones between Port aux Basques and Cook's Harbour in southwestern, western and northern Newfoundland along the Gulf of St. Lawrence?

2. What are the locations in the same area with the availability of adequate freezing and storage capacity?

3. What are the sectors or zones which expressed an interest and were given allocations?

4. What are the designated ports in the Gulf of St. Lawrence in southwestern, western and northern Newfoundland into which Bulgarian vessels were allowed to enter to purchase mackerel and squid in designated quantities since May 20, 1978?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

1. With respect to the arrangement permitting the purchase by Bulgaria of squid and mackerel caught by Atlantic provinces fishermen, no purchases were made in the province of Newfoundland between Port-aux-Basques and Cook's Harbour in southwestern, western and northern Newfoundland along the Gulf of St. Lawrence. No purchases of these two species were made in this area because none could be fished when the first Bulgarian vessel went to the area. The first vessel was given permission to locate in the Bay of Islands initially and shortly after in St. John Bay. However, the vessel did not stop in St. John Bay as mackerel was reported in the Twillingate Island area at the time the vessel was proceeding to St. John Bay. The vessel steamed around to the Twillingate area where the first purchasing operation took place.

2. In the area of the province from Port-aux-Basques to Cook's Harbour there are two centres that offer storage and freezing capacity. At Port-aux-Basques there are freezing and cold storage facilities with storage capacity in the order of approximately 5 million pounds. In the Port au Choix area, freezing facilities are available and at present cold storage facilities are being constructed with an estimated capacity of approximately 1.5 million pounds.

3. From that area, Port-aux-Basques to Cook's Harbour, there was very little interest expressed by any group in the sale of mackerel or squid to Bulgarian interests. The Bulgarian vessel Ofelia was located in the Bay of Islands area for a short period (1-2 days); however, fishermen in the area did not show any significant interest in catching and selling of these species. That same vessel then proceeded to the northeast coast of Newfoundland.

4. Covered in answer to question 1.

SHRIMP YIELD—NEWFOUNDLAND—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 16—By Senator Marshall:

1. What is the potential shrimp yield in the province of Newfoundland?

2. Of the yield what tonnage was caught in the province of Newfoundland?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

1. There are two areas of shrimp concentration adjacent to the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador that are being exploited at the present time:

Coast of Labrador: This fishery started in 1976 with the first catches by Canadians being made in 1977. For 1978, Total Allowable Catches (TACs) were set for four separate areas, totalling 6,600 MT with an additional TAC of 500 MT for the area off N.W. Newfoundland.

West Coast of Newfoundland: The main fishery is centered in the Esquiman Channel. No quotas are established for this area but the number of licences is limited, with some 35 vessels eligible.

Research on shrimp distribution, stock structure and abundance is being carried out actively, at the present time, in order to provide improved information on the long-term potential yield not only from the waters off Newfoundland but also from other Canadian Atlantic waters.

2. Coast of Labrador: In 1977, catches of 2,631 MT were taken, of which 2,039 MT were landed in Newfoundland. Preliminary catch information indicates that, for 1978 to date, a total of 3,044 MT has been taken with 1,296 MT landed in Newfoundland.

West Coast of Newfoundland: Catches in 1977 amounted to 1,207 MT, of which all but 8 MT was landed in Newfoundland. Preliminary catch data for 1978 to date show 2,027 MT, all being landed in Newfoundland.

CANADIAN SURPLUS OF FISH—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 27—By Senator Marshall:

1. Referring to Fisheries and Environment Release FMS-HQ-NR-# 31, dated September 21, 1978, what species and quantities of fish, considered surplus to Canada, were offered to foreign countries for sharing in the northwest Atlantic?

2. What countries accepted the above offer, and what economic benefits were offered in return?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

1. At the June meeting of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries (ICNAF) quantities surplus to Canadian requirements were established on a stock by stock basis. Canada informed ICNAF members that parts of some of these surpluses would be held in reserve for allocation later in the year, to Canadian fishermen if required, and to foreign fleets, in response to proposals for the purchase of Canadian fish products. The reserves announced at the ICNAF meeting were as follows:

2,000 m.t.	Cod	(2GH)
5,080 m.t.	Redfish	(2+3K)*
5,060 m.t.	Redfish	(30)
10,220 m.t.	Silver Hake	(4VWX)
3,000 m.t.	Witch	(2J+3KL)
5,000 m.t.	Greenland Halibut	(2+3KL)*
5,000 m.t.	Roundnose Grenadier	(2+3)
2,070 m.t.	Argentine	(4VWX)
72,500 m.t.	Capelin	(2+3K)*
Total 109,930 m.t.

Decisions on other stocks were deferred: 2J+3KL cod to the fall of 1978; 3+4 squid and 3LNO capelin to spring, 1979.

* The Canadian Government has since withdrawn 5,080 m.t. Redfish (2+3K) and 5,000 m.t. Greenland Halibut (2+3KL) from the reserve list, to meet the needs of Canadian fishermen from these stocks in 1979.

Concern over the biological status of the capelin stock in 2+3K has resulted in a closure of that fishery by the Canadian government until further scientific evaluation of the stock has been completed.

2. Since the total surplus for the Northern cod stock in 2J+3KL has not yet been established, allocations from this stock against the offer to purchase Canadian fish products have not yet been completed.

Arrangements with Canada's bilateral partners regarding their allocations and purchases of Canadian fish products are in the process of negotiation. This process will not be completed until late spring 1979.

THE CONSTITUTION

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.—(Honourable Senator Bell).

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I intend to devote all my remarks to a critical analysis of the Pepin-Robarts Task Force report. In so doing, I feel I am staying within the Orders of the Day because although I will not be making specific references to the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution I will be dealing with the very subject matter of the mandate that committee received.

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Lamontagne: The report of the Pepin-Robarts Task Force is a significant document which has already raised many comments and has the merit of having put the problem of national unity back in the forefront of the news. To appreciate the content of that report I think we ought to distinguish between the analysis it makes of the Canadian crisis and the recommendations it advocates to overcome it.

Very few people will disagree with the general direction of the analysis of the Canadian crisis, even though it is somewhat succinct as it appears in the report and one might be justified in rejecting certain aspects. In short, that analysis is based on dualism and regionalism, two truly Canadian realities it was important to recall although doing so was not very original.

I regret, however, that the task force decided to identify regionalism to provincialism and did not take into account an increasingly important dimension of regionalism on a smaller geographical scale within the provinces, at least the larger ones. That local regionalism as it might be called is becoming an ever increasing reality in Canada and the lasting refusal to recognize its existence is, I think, one of the essential elements of the Canadian crisis.

Indeed, a growing number of people do not care all that much about a decentralization of the powers of the central government toward the provinces. They find provincial governments have also become too big, too bureaucratic and too remote to meet their aspirations and particular concerns adequately. The new community spirit which in my opinion coincides with the revival of individualism calls for a redefinition of the role of government and a decentralization of administrative structures and decision-making centres at the small regional level to bring them closer to the people, make them more visible and more humane. Regretfully the task force did not take into account that local dimension of regionalism because that is precisely where it could have innovated and truly contributed to reducing the alienation which a lot of people suffer from in their daily lives.

[English]

I come now to the recommendations of the Task Force on Canadian Unity. I do not intend to comment on all of them, but I shall limit myself to those related to the division of powers and to changes in our political institutions.

The proposals of the task force regarding the division of powers are, to say the least, ambiguous and not very helpful. To start with, the task force does not put forward a blueprint for a new distribution of jurisdictions but merely a general approach that should serve as a guide to effect such a distribution. That general approach is functional and designed, in the words used by the task force, to ... respect the need for a central government that can handle problems of Canada-wide importance and maintain a viable Canadian federation, for provincial governments that can handle regional and provincial concerns for local prosperity and preferences.

The task force also suggests that the areas of concurrent jurisdiction should be minimized. I submit that any federalist, whether he favours centralization or decentralization, could subscribe to those general guidelines. In fact, those are the very principles that inspired the Fathers of Confederation in 1867.

The task force has illustrated how its general approach would work in practice. It is interesting to look at some of those illustrations. The task force repeats on several occasions that the new distribution of powers must respect the need ... for the Quebec government to maintain and develop its distinct culture and heritage.

Further on it adds:

In the case of Quebec, it should be assured of the full powers needed for the preservation and expansion of its distinctive heritage.

Logically, those statements could lead to the recognition of a special status for Quebec. The task force comes up with the following most ambiguous proposal: the preservation and expansion of Quebec's distinctive heritage ... would require either exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction, assigned to all provinces generally or to Quebec specifically, over such matters as language, culture, civil law, research and communications, as well as related power to tax and to establish some relations in these fields with foreign countries.

That statement contains two quite different and incompatible proposals. It says that, in the above-mentioned matters, exclusive jurisdiction could be assigned to Quebec specifically, which is the explicit recognition of special status; but it also asserts that in such matters concurrent jurisdiction could be assigned to all provinces generally, which represents an acceptance of the substance of our present constitutional arrangements. Those two incompatible proposals represent a remarkable tour de force for a single sentence.

The task force could not obviously maintain those two incompatible positions. Later on in its report, it clearly rejects the concept of special status and states that instead of assigning to Quebec formal law-making powers denied the other provinces

... much the more preferable approach is to allot to all provinces powers in the areas needed by Quebec to maintain its distinctive culture and heritage, but to do so in a manner which would enable the other provinces, if they so wished, not to exercise these responsibilities and instead leave them to Ottawa.

Thus, the task force has rediscovered the opting out formula that was approved by Parliament in 1965.

Senator Flynn: Before that.

Senator Lamontagne: In 1960. I cannot understand, therefore, how Mr. René Lévesque can honestly claim that the task force has recommended a special status for Quebec.

It is very difficult to see how the areas of concurrent jurisdiction would be reduced if the general approach proposed by the task force were to be followed. Let us just take a few examples. Taxation, with one exception, would become an area of concurrent jurisdiction. The provincial governments would be responsible for provincial economic development but the central government would be assigned the management of Canada-wide economic policy and participation in the stimulation of regional economic activity. The federal government, according to the task force, would have overriding responsibility for the conduct of international relations, but the provinces should have the right to sign international treaties in matters coming under their jurisdiction. While social well-being—again according to the task force—should be a principal role of the provinces, the redistribution of income should be a main responsibility of the federal government. The provinces would look after the cultural development of their communities but, in the opinion of the task force, “both orders of government have important responsibilities in the cultural field" and the central government should, among other assignments, "use its cultural agencies to encourage individuals, throughout Canada, to develop their talents."

Thus, it is true to say that the areas of concurrent jurisdiction would be extended rather than reduced if the general approach recommended by the task force were to be followed. This observation is particularly important and intriguing in view of the role that it assigns to the proposed Council of the Federation. But I will come back to that topic later.

To conclude my remarks regarding the proposals of the task force for a new distribution of powers, I want to repeat that they are ambiguous and not very helpful. It is not too surprising that they have been interpreted in conflicting ways by different people according to their respective preferences and prejudices. The message they contained is blurred and is probably the result of the decision taken by the task force to present a unanimous report on complex and highly controversial issues.

By contrast, when the task force deals with federal institutions and mechanisms related to federal-provincial relations, its message is clear and specific. But I will try to show that its central recommendation for a Council of the Federation is illogical, inconsistent and impractical.

To begin with, the task force adheres to the concept of a true federalism. It states: "A definitive characteristic of any federal system is the equality of status under the constitution of the two orders of government, central and provincial, in relation to each other." This is what it describes as the principle of non-subordination of the two orders of government.

We all know that the Fathers of Confederation in 1867 established a quasi-unitary system, un fédéralisme de tutelle, as I used to describe it. Sir John A. Macdonald made it very clear when he stated that the local legislatures would be subordinated to the federal government. The task force goes a long way to eliminate that subordination and to provide, in that respect at least, for a more genuine type of federalism.

It limits the use of emergency powers by the federal government. The central declaratory power would be subject to the consent of the provinces concerned, which amounts in practice to its abolishment. The use of the spending power of the federal government in areas of provincial jurisdiction would also be restricted, and, when utilized, provinces would have the right to opt out of any program and where appropriate receive fiscal compensation. The central power of reservation and of disallowance would be abolished. The appointment of lieutenant-governors would be made on the advice of provincial premiers. All provincial judges would be appointed by the provincial governments but, with respect to higher court judges, only after consultation with the central government. I support the substance of those proposals. Several of them have already been accepted for many years by the federal government.

[Senator Lamontagne.]

The ambiguity of the message of the task force appears again when it deals with inter-governmental relations. At first, it seems to reject the traditional Canadian approach to what it describes as "executive federalism," consisting of direct negotiations between the executives of both orders of government, through a network of conferences, to provide for ongoing consultation, negotiation and decision-making. The task force states that it prefers to build executive federalism into the parliamentary institutions at the central level. Hence its proposal for a Council of the Federation composed of representatives of provincial governments. Logically, that preference should mean, at least in my interpretation, the end of federal-provincial conferences.

However, later on in its report, the task force states that the Council of the Federation would not eliminate the necessity for inter-governmental meetings and conferences. It goes on to propose "that the Conference of First Ministers be put on a regular annual basis and that additional conferences be held whenever a government secures the agreement of simple majority of the other ten." It recommends the creation of a committee on policy issues made up of the 11 ministers of inter-governmental affairs "to establish agendas, to co-ordinate preparatory research and the development of proposals, and to follow through on the implementation of agreements resulting from such conferences." It suggests the establishment of a standing task force of officials and experts representing all governments "to review policy and program duplication on a continuing basis." It recommends conferences of first ministers every two or three years on medium-term economic strategy. It submits that the annual conference of finance ministers should be used more effectively to ensure the co-ordination of economic stabilization policies. Finally, it proposes that standing committees be established on federal-provincial relations in the House of Commons and in all provincial legislatures. Thus, the task force, far from proposing the elimination of federal-provincial conferences and agencies, recommends that they should be institutionalized and multiplied.

It is in this whole context that the proposal for a Council of the Federation should be examined. In the first place, the task force suggests that two important functions presently exercised by the Senate be transferred to the House of Commons, namely, the critical review and improvement of central government legislation and the conducting of investigatory studies. It is obvious that the House of Commons as presently constituted and operated cannot efficiently perform those essential functions.

The task force simply recommends that the committee system in the House of Commons be modified and strengthened and that the government should make more extensive use of special committees in that house to conduct in-depth studies of major Canadian issues. As experience shows, this is much more easily said than done. The government will not easily abandon its control over the creation and the operation of committees in the House of Commons. Moreover, it would be naive to expect that those committees will cease to operate on a partisan basis and to concentrate on short-term issues. For instance, we have tried for years but without any success to convince the other place to establish a committee on science policy.

The task force seems to rely a great deal on the 60 non-elected members that it proposes to add to the House of Commons to improve the performance of its committees. However, the mere addition of those members would not reduce in any way the control exercised by the executive over those committees. Moreover, those additional members can be expected to be even more partisan than elected members because they would have no power base of their own and their political future would depend entirely on the pleasure of their respective parties and more particularly their leaders. It is clear, therefore, that the two most important functions presently fulfilled by the Senate would cease to be exercised properly if the views of the task force were to be accepted.

According to the task force, the future second chamber of the federal Parliament or the Council of the Federation would be "composed of provincial delegations to whom provincial governments could issue instructions, each delegation being headed by a person of ministerial rank or on occasion by the premier." There would be no more than 60 voting members, and central government cabinet ministers would be non-voting members. The council would have the power to initiate legislation regarding constitutional amendments. A proclamation of a state of emergency, in either peacetime or wartime, would have to be confirmed by at least a two-thirds majority of the council. All proposed federal legislation and articles of treaties deemed to belong to concurrent jurisdiction would be subject to a suspensive veto by the council, of short duration if there is federal paramountcy and of longer duration if there is provincial paramountcy. Federal initiatives in areas of provincial jurisdiction that are based on the federal spending power, whether they are to be cost-shared or financed fully from federal funds, should require a two-thirds majority of the council. The council could be used as a forum for the discussion of general proposals arising from conferences of first ministers or any other matters of concern to the members of the council itself. Federal appointments to the Supreme Court, to major regulatory bodies such as the CRTC, the Canadian Transport Commission and the National Energy Board, and to central institutions such as the Bank of Canada and the CBC, would require the approval of the appropriate committee of the council. Finally, "to determine the classification of a bill or treaty and hence the powers that the council may exercise, a permanent committee should be created and composed of the speakers and some members from both the House of Commons and the council."

I was surprised when, as a co-chairman of the Joint Committee on the Constitution, some academics proposed the creation of a House of the Provinces. I must say today that I can hardly understand how experienced politicians have come to endorse a similar proposal. Without intending to detail all my objections to such a recommendation, I will examine it both at the logical and practical levels.

At the logical level, I have already praised the task force for its attempt to eliminate from our constitutional arrangements the elements of a quasi-unitary state inserted in 1867 that subordinated provincial governments to the federal government, and for its effort in this respect to establish a genuine type of federalism. Indeed, throughout its report, the task force rightly insists on the requirement that the two orders of government should have equal status and that the principle of non-subordination should be observed in a restructured federalism.

However, the task force is clearly inconsistent with itself and the basic principles it advocates in its recommendation for a second chamber in the Canadian Parliament. It then proposes to subordinate, in a very significant way, the federal government to the provinces, and it introduces into our constitutional arrangements a most important element of a confederal system, in spite of the objections it raises against such a system. Its recommendation would bring provincial governments directly, and in many areas, into the legislative process of the Canadian Parliament and into the system of appointments of the federal government to genuine central institutions. This is completely incompatible, in my view, with the concept of federalism presented by the task force itself.

The recommendation regarding the Council of the Federation is not only illogical and inconsistent with the gist of the report, it is autocratic in its inspiration and most impractical when considered in the light of the real world of politics. The members of the council would not be free agents. They would not be allowed to vote according to their preferences and conscience. They would be part of a provincial bloc operating directly under the instructions of provincial premiers, and they could be removed immediately if they did not follow the instructions of their premiers. Such a legislative and so-called "deliberative" council, completely subjected to remote and outside control, would not fit very well within our British parliamentary institutions. In fact, three or four premiers could effectively control the council and deal with legislation that could concern only the other provinces. The Atlantic provinces, with only 14 votes out of 60, would not have a great influence on the council's decisions, even if those were related to regional disparities or other matters of exclusive concern to the Atlantic region. Seen in that light, the recommendation of the task force that federal expenditures related to equalization should not be submitted to the council for approval is intriguing, to say the least.

The mandate of provincial premiers is to look after public affairs under their jurisdiction from a provincial point of view. That perspective may well be incompatible with the national point of view which constitutes the federal mandate. Moreover, those provincial premiers are also leaders of a political party, and when their political allegiance does not coincide with that of the Canadian government, we have again another source of disagreement, antagonism and conflict. Having attended a great number of federal-provincial conferences since 1955, I know that this is also a deeply rooted Canadian reality.

The council would constitute a continuing federal-provincial conference dealing with federal legislation in which federal representatives would not have the right to participate in the decisions. This situation becomes quite ridiculous when one looks at the scope of activities that the council would have.

The council would deal with all federal bills and treaties "deemed to belong to the category of concurrent jurisdiction." But, as I have already attempted to show, if the general approach suggested by the task force were to be followed, most matters concerning the state would belong to that category, or it could at least be argued in specific cases that they are deemed to fall under concurrent jurisdiction. The council, with its natural inclination to broaden its role and responsibilities, would certainly do so. The House of Commons, presumably, would take the opposite point of view and try to restrict the activities of the council. Thus, even the selection of federal bills to be submitted to the council would become a matter of federal-provincial negotiation and potential conflict.

Who would resolve those most important issues, involving, in many cases, an interpretation of the Constitution? The task force suggests a permanent committee "composed of the Speakers and some members from both the House of Commons and the Council." This is a rather vague recommendation for such an important mandate. Would the two chambers have equal representation on the committee? Who would finally decide if no agreement can be reached? If the opposition in the House of Commons were opposed to a certain bill, would it not be tempted, through its representation on the committee, to side with the members of the council and thus unduly enlarge the area of concurrent jurisdiction? Would such a committee tend to become a substitute for the Supreme Court in the interpretation of the Constitution?

In another important area, the central government would have no say in the approval of appointments to the Supreme Court and to the boards of major federal institutions. Such approval would be left ultimately to provincial premiers, including Mr. René Lévesque—at least for the time being. Probably more than 100 appointments would be involved. What would happen if provincial premiers could not agree among themselves, as is most likely? It is easy to realize that such a system would be much worse than the American system, which is seen by many Canadians as being undesirable.

I could go on and on and mention other serious objections to that recommendation of the task force. I believe I have said enough to show that its implementation would be impractical and almost unworkable. The creation of the council, in addition to the series of the first ministers' conferences and the other federal-provincial mechanisms and bodies envisaged by the task force, would seriously, and almost completely, paralyze the decision-making process within the central government and the Canadian Parliament.

The task force was right when it stated:

—that a federal system often slows the process of rapid and effective policy-making in such areas as the economy,

that it sometimes tends to generate conflict between governments, that it sometimes creates opportunities which vested interest can exploit to assert themselves against the common public interest—

I suggest, however, that the creation of the proposed council would significantly magnify those inherent weaknesses of federalism by introducing into it an undesirable element of a confederal system. I wish to add that many of the criticisms I have made about the council would apply equally to the House of the Federation proposed in Bill C-60.

To sum up, some of the recommendations of the task force are good but they are not new. Others are not very helpful or are clearly unacceptable. Many commentators have said that what was most valuable in the report was the message or the broad framework for constitutional change. After having tried to read the report very, very carefully and with, I hope, an open mind, I regret to say that I find the message ambiguous and blurred. It seems to me that the task force has spoken with two voices, one provincial, the other federal, one for a distinctive provincial status, the other for a uniform provincial status. I must say that I would have preferred more realistic recommendations and a clearer message. I do hope that the Senate Special Committee on the Constitution will do a better job.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to Senator Lamontagne, but before doing so I would like to say that he has given us an excellent analysis of the report, and I might also say that I concur with most of his observations. I say "most" because I would like to read his speech tomorrow.

With regard to the Council of the Federation, I accept his conclusion that the council would, in a way, block the legislative process in some respects. I know he has read the report where it says that matters coming under the exclusive competence of the federal Parliament would not require the approval of the council. The other day I was trying to find on the order paper of this place or on the order paper of the other place a piece of legislation on which the council would have to move, and I could not find one. In some areas the council could enter into the picture, but in most areas falling within the exclusive competence of the federal Parliament, it would have nothing to say. Would the honourable senator agree?

Senator Lamontagne: After a very careful reading of the report, I can find very few areas of exclusive jurisdiction assigned to either the federal or the provincial governments. Most of the areas would involve concurrent jurisdiction, and even the recommendations of the task force respecting defence and national security say that they would be in the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government. But the proclamation of a state of emergency in wartime would require the approval of a two-thirds majority of the council composed exclusively of provincial delegations. So this leaves very little to the exclusive competence or jurisdiction of the federal government.

Senator Flynn: As far as emergency powers are concerned, I am not too sure that I do not agree with the idea of having the provinces involved. But I was thinking, for instance, of legislation dealing with banking or bankruptcy or Canadian corporations—legislation that we have dealt with in the current session. I could not find one piece of legislation in which the Council of the Federation would have something to say under the present proposals.

Senator Lamontagne: It really depends on how you interpret the wording used by the task force. They say that the federal government shall have responsibility for Canada-wide economic policy, but they also add that the provinces should have as their main responsibility economic development within their own areas. So there is a great deal of potential here for concurrent jurisdiction.

Senator Flynn: But then they might have something to do with income tax legislation in the federal Parliament because that would involve concurrent competence. Of course, you could reply that the federal Parliament should have something to say in the provincial legislatures about that also, and I would like to have to deal with some of Mr. Parizeau's measures.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Lamontagne a question along the same lines, but before doing so I certainly want to join Senator Flynn in saying that this was a most illuminating analysis of what to me is a complicated and difficult report. It may be that I look at it from a different point of view, but I do agree with much of what Senator Lamontagne said.

On this question of what should be exclusively federal and what should be exclusively provincial, do I understand him to interpret the recommendation about the committee of the two Speakers and some members of each house as being to place within the jurisdiction of that committee the final decision as to the class into which any particular piece of proposed legislation might fall?

Senator Lamontagne: Exactly. In the framework proposed by the task force, the Constitution would specify the areas of concurrent jurisdiction and would also indicate in each area where there is federal paramountcy and where there is provincial paramountcy. But, of course, the Constitution could not cover all cases, so this joint committee would have to decide and determine the classification into which each bill would fall.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I do not pretend to have studied the report in the way that the honourable senator obviously has; but is it his opinion that the decision of this committee would be the final word on the matter?

Senator Lamontagne: I presume if there is disagreement on important issues there could be an appeal to the Supreme Court. But that is not mentioned in the report.

Senator Smith (Colchester): If I may pursue the point a little further, did it seem to him that either the federal government on the one hand or a concerned provincial government on the other, dissatisfied with the decision of this committee, could initiate a reference to the Supreme Court?

Senator Lamontagne: I would think so. I am not a lawyer, of course, but I believe that the federal government can initiate a reference to the Supreme Court. There is a recommendation in the report that provincial governments could also initiate a reference to the Supreme Court. So presumably if the members of the council were not satisfied with the decision of this joint committee, they could report to their bosses and their bosses could make a reference to the Supreme Court.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Thank you.

AGING

DESIRABILITY OF ESTABLISHING GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENT— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, January 24, 1979:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a department of the Government of Canada to deal with all matters relating to aging.

He said: Honourable senators, on the weekend, after hearing and reading about the Task Force on Canadian Unity, I thought this resolution to establish a government department relating to aging was a waste of time. It appeared that the bell had begun to toll and that the countdown had commenced for the Senate. No favourable winds blew in the direction of the Senate in 1978, and I was afraid that 1979 would be a repetition, so I came in yesterday to read the report. I was impressed by much of it, but I was disturbed and distressed by other parts.

In some respects, particularly as it affects the Senate, the report is unreal. I speak from experience. I have been in politics continuously for nearly 50 years, and I have served and been active in all levels of government. I know how to get elected; I know the administration of government; I know how to stay elected; and I know how governments operate in a democracy. All the members of the task force put together do not have as much political experience as I have.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Croll: None of them have served in four houses, and I do not think many of them have served in even two houses—certainly the majority haven't. The recommendations they make will, without doubt, lead to a continuous political paralysis, much like that affecting Italy.

The report recommends a Council of the Federation—not a Senate, mind you—appointed by the provinces, its members acting as provincial delegates on orders. That recommendation is unbelievably naive because it's a political roadblock. What is more, it is moving dangerously in the constitutional direction that will decentralize, paralyze and emasculate; stripping the federal government of most of its essential powers; balkanizing the nation to a point of ungovernableness—surely one nation, divisible. Well, not with my approval or consent.

I am not going to sit quietly by while the Utopian dreamers on the team bust up my country. The Prime Minister was right when he said that they were dead wrong about some things, and they are dead wrong on this. I believe that the fortunes and the future of the Senate will be decided by the Supreme Court of Canada, and I am confident that the decision will be a favourable one. Still, the Senate will never be the same again—I hope.

I do not feel abolished, or even half abolished, and so it is business as usual in constructive fashion, and in the public interest I proceed with my inquiry respecting the desirability of establishing a department of aging.

We now have a National Bureau of Aging within the Department of National Health and Welfare, with objectives, with goals, and with a director and a small staff. My proposal is that we need an agency just for the aged. There are more aged than there are veterans; there are more aged than there are Indians; and there are more aged than there are people covered by the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch. There are now the Ministry of State for the Environment, the Ministry of State for Small Business, the Ministry of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, the Ministry of State for Multiculturalism, and the Ministry of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. In my view, the interests, the future and the needs of the elderly are far more important than the matters covered by those ministries.

The proportion of elderly is growing. In 1950 one person in 12 was 65 years of age or older. In 1976 the ratio was one in nine, and in the year 2000 it will probably be one in five. With this shift the needs of the old, and the economic burdens they create, become a pressing social and economic concern.

At the same time, the political needs of the aged have to be reckoned with. They have not yet come to the polls in large numbers, nor have they organized themselves into pressure groups, or even become mildly militant—they are still walking down the middle of the road.

Some psychiatrists have indicated from time to time that in many ways youth does not care much for the elderly, and there is a great deal of evidence to show that many of the elderly do not like themselves either. They feel that the world no longer needs them. They worry that their minds are slipping, although their reasoning, and most of their other intellectual powers, generally remain intact almost to the end of life. Money is the biggest problem. Older people have specialized medical problems, though in this country we handle them very well. On the other hand, there are very few medical schools which give much attention to geriatric medicine.

The establishment of a department cannot be viewed as a symbolic gesture. It has to do with the place of old people in our society, whether they just survive or whether they contribute. To date they have represented a natural resource which we have squandered. It has been found that the old people are worse off in industrial countries than in underdeveloped countries because, among other reasons, the traditional support of members of the family in the community has diminished.

They lack a political spokesman, as do women's interests. They do not have a political spokesman as has labour, farmers, or business. They lack a single national organization to speak for them.

The elderly place most of their emphasis on income. Important as that is, at this stage it is far more important to obtain recognition in the form of a department, and a minister who will be in a position to encourage them and emphasize their economic needs. Supplementary income is important, but it is far more important to have a spokesman at the cabinet level in Parliament, with special responsibility for the elderly.

While there is an unquestionable need to provide more elderly Canadians with adequate income, improved job opportunities, better housing, special medical and welfare services and recreational facilities, these requirements will become much more pressing in terms of quantity and quality as the general population ages.

For the last 20 years Canadian society has been struggling in haphazard and unorganized fashion to cope with the unprecedented increase in the young in our population following World War II. We have overlooked the fact that an ever-growing number of Canadians have been joining the ranks of the retired and semi-retired, and we must immediately begin to adjust our youth-oriented society to better meet the needs of those who are 60 and 65 years of age, and plan, together with the provinces, for the time when the elderly and not so elderly are able to become a more dominant factor in our society.

In 1966 the Special Senate Committee on Aging tried to alert the Canadian government and the Canadian people to the implications of the aging population in modern industrial nations, and indicated that no developed nation had adjusted to a relatively stable and aging population so far in this century. The warning by the Senate committee met with modest success, yet the current Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies is hearing overwhelming testimony which indicates that the federal level of government is only beginning to recognize the magnitude and implications of the challenge that lies ahead.

The challenge, insofar as the elderly are concerned, is both present and long term. A department of aging, with its own minister, with definite responsibilities, objectives, research facilities, coordination and liaison mechanisms, as well as information, is urgently needed by the people of Canada. Statistics Canada has prepared a number of population projections for the late twentieth century and early twenty-first century. The most frequently used is based on assumptions which are reasonable and reflect current conditions, as follows:

1. A total fertility rate equal to 1.9 in 1976, declining to 1.7 in 1990, and remaining constant.

2. The average length of life rising until 1986 and reaching 70.2 for men and 78.3 for women, and remaining constant thereafter.

3. A net immigration equal to 75,000 per year.

The number of elderly citizens—those over 65—is even now growing at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, which is about twice the rate of growth for the population as a whole. The nature of the elderly population is indicating a change, and the old of the future are expected to differ from the old of today in terms of behaviour, values and expectations. Their level of education is much higher, and the percentage of those with at least some post-secondary education will quadruple from about 5 per cent in 1971 to 20 per cent in the year 2000.

The changes among elderly women will be even greater. An increase in the over-75 age segment in the population will lead to an increasing number of women, because women live longer than men. The growing predominance of women in the 65 age group will have implications for society which have not yet been thoroughly studied. The changing role of women in society, due to their much greater education, participation in the labour force and independence, will have an important and undetermined influence on their requirements and expectations as they age.

Twelve years ago the Special Senate Committee on Aging noted that Canada lagged considerably behind the United States, Great Britain and other European countries in the attention being devoted to the scientific study of elderly people and their problems. Although valuable research has been done, and the training of specialists in gerontology and geriatrics has improved, the basic assessment made in 1976 is still valid today.

In its brief to the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies, the Canadian Association of Gerontology expressed the fear that the development of expertise might be wasted by fragmentation of knowledge and techniques as a result of poor communications between many disciplines. It is important that continuing research into the economic, social and medical applications of an aging population, and into the developing needs of the elderly, be financed and co-ordinated. A federal department of aging, assisted perhaps by a national advisory council on aging, could undertake the organization of fundamental research, and act as a co-ordination agency for the collection and exchange of research and information on all aspects of aging.

The essential mandate of a department of aging would be to assume responsibility for federal income security legislation directed towards the retired. The present retirement income can be described as a three-tier system. The federal old age security, guaranteed income supplement and spouses' allowance programs make up the first. The second tier includes the basic public contributory pension schemes, the Canada and Quebec Pension plans, and the provincial supplements recently introduced by some provinces. These two tiers are intended to ensure basic adequacy in income for the retired. The third tier consists of employment-related and private pensions, as well as the assets and savings of Canadians.

Both the government-sponsored programs—tiers one and two—and the employer-sponsored pension plans have serious deficiencies. According to the brief of the Honourable Monique Bégin, Minister of National Health and Welfare, delivered to the Special Senate Committee on Retirement Age Policies, poverty is widespread amongst our elderly population, as the following facts show.

In 1975, the average annual income from all sources was $3,796 for unattached pensioners, and $8,746 for couples. In contrast, the average annual income of census families with heads aged 45 to 54 was $19,955.

In 1975, 61 per cent of unattached senior citizens and 22 per cent of elderly couples were below the Statistics Canada revised low income cut-offs. In total, almost half of the pensioners were below these poverty lines.

In 1978, 54 per cent of all pensioners were poor enough to be receiving guaranteed income supplement payments. Moreover, 19 per cent were totally dependent upon OAS and GIS benefits.

For a number of reasons, women are treated particularly badly. In 1975 more than two-thirds of all unmarried women over the age of 65—more than 400,000 of them—had annual cash incomes below $3,500, which is below the poverty line established by Statistics Canada and well below the Senate committee's poverty line, or any other poverty line that has ever been established.

Correction of these deficiencies in meeting even a reasonable escalation of the requirements of the greater number of retired in the future will require larger contributions to the government-sponsored programs by the government, employees and employers alike. It will also require fundamental changes in portability, vesting, indexing, and survivors' provisions of the employer-sponsored programs, particularly since these latter plans provide those aged 65 and over with only 13 per cent of their retirement income, whereas government plans provide 50 per cent.

These facts present matters of serious concern, and no one can dispute the vigour with which the present minister has pursued the interests of retired Canadians, or the value of the policy research undertaken by the Department of National Health and Welfare. A separate department will be able to devote its full energy towards finding solutions to these problems and to pressing these solutions upon both the government and the public.

Much of the financial burden of providing for the needs of the elderly falls on the shoulders of provincial governments. The costs involved in providing the elderly with health services, housing—ranging from full institutional care and rest homes to financial help in maintaining private dwelling—welfare, education, and social and recreational facilities will eventually escalate.

In 1976, when 9.7 per cent of the population was 65 and over, two provinces had substantially higher percentages than the others, and they were Prince Edward Island with 11.2 per cent, and Saskatchewan with 11.1 per cent. Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario are also experiencing increases in their share of the national elderly population. The formation of a federal department of aging would not only help to unify the federal response, but would assist federal-provincial negotiations and the co-ordination of federal-provincial policy and long-term planning.

There are many reasons why the federal government should set up a department to deal with the question of aging. The federal government is the senior partner in our federation. It is the only body that, by virtue of its constitutional powers, can promote, consolidate, investigate and, to a large degree, direct programs that relate to the problem in order to give the elderly people of this country that which they are without at the present time—and here I am referring to clout, power, influence and attention. Aging not only faces the individuals, but it has been recognized that there has been a “greying of nations.” Aging is a condition all of us face by surviving.

I have been urging the establishment of a department. I have already indicated that the minister has announced the establishment of a National Bureau of Aging within the Department of National Health and Welfare. This could not be more than a very minor step in dealing with the question which will become increasingly important as our society matures. Even with a national bureau, we will still be putting the problem on the back burner.

As I have said before, it is not simply that older persons have more acute problems than youth: that is true, but the broader issue is that of an aging society which has, to some degree, come to depend on the youthful majority to fund its social security system. It is quite clear, from demographic projections, that the proportion of elderly persons will double in the foreseeable future, and we have been given the signal and the opportunity to foresee and forestall the implications of this maturing process. We can set up a federal department of aging to plan the future and to catch up to the present.

What are, first, the jurisdictional considerations; secondly, the functional considerations; and, lastly, the mechanical considerations in order to deal with aging?

Before we look into those problems, I would ask you to turn your attention to the final report of the Special Senate Committee on Aging which enumerated the areas which are crucial to the question, and they are (1) income status and security; (2) employment status and opportunities; (3) health status and health care; (4) housing status and needs; (5) community services for older people; (6) research and statistics; and (7) planning and co-ordination.

We may well ask: Does the federal government have authority to deal with these matters? Even if it does not have jurisdiction, prima facie, pursuant to the provisions of the British North America Act its spending power is such that, if it were to see fit to enter this arena more forcefully, it could do so.

On the question of the spending power of the federal government, I should like to quote what the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau said in Federal-Provincial Grants and the Spending Power of Parliament, in June 1969. He said:

Constitutionally . . . the term “spending power” has come to have a specialized meaning in Canada. It means the power of Parliament to make payments to people or institutions or governments for purposes on which it (Parliament) does not necessarily have the power to legislate.

While not all interpret the British North America Act so broadly, to date federal-provincial relations indicate that there has been some consensus, at least practically speaking, on this interpretation. Having in mind our social legislation, it has been clear that the federal government can take the initiative where it wishes to do so, subject now to the gentleman's agreement that it will not involve the provinces in any further major cost-sharing schemes without prior consultation.

The federal government is involved in two important aspects—income tax and social security schemes, which include Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security, Guaranteed Income Supplement, and the Canada Assistance Plan. In addition to taxing powers, the federal government has leverage in areas such as private pension schemes which are ordinarily matters of contract within provincial powers. For an aging population, a number of areas of concern arise out of the taxation rules relating to pension schemes, and they are: (1) mandatory retirement age; (2) the need to encourage employment of elderly workers; and (3) problems of vesting, locking-in, and pension benefits standards legislation.

In a society which is mobile in terms of employment, and one which would want to encourage older workers, we will have to re-examine pension schemes to allow for total portability. It is one thing to have a portable scheme funded by Parliament, but there is no reason why the tax structure could not be studied to encourage private portability as well. The taxation rules in this area are extremely complex and are tied to the tax structure in general. Continued administration should likely be left to the department as it presently exists. However, a department of aging could certainly play a very large investigative and co-ordinating role with the tax department in all areas to deal with the problems mentioned above. In this regard the federal department of aging could co-ordinate between private enterprise, provincial governments and other governmental departments, and be a leading advocate of reform in those areas likely to affect our society on these questions.

There is no need to examine the appalling statistics on employment opportunities for the elderly. They do not exist. They do not start at age 65. Coming from a youth-oriented society, the process begins at age 40 or thereafter. The federal government has jurisdiction over unemployment insurance. This power gives it the right and the obligation to deal with unemployment. At the present time, the indications are that as far as the over-65s are concerned, nothing is being done. The government assumes that because the old age pension and the Canada Pension Plan become payable at 65, everyone is then considered retired and out of the work force. Unemployment benefits are not available to those over 65. At the present time there are no wage subsidies for older workers, although there are for youths. This is partly due to pressures forcing the government to deal with the most urgent problem of the day, but it does not speak well of a society that is aging, and someone should be planning for this.

Constitutionally, the question of health is the clearest example we have of co-operative federalism. It shows the power of the federal government to deal with such important items which, in reality, do not fall within its jurisdiction. It was the federal government that took the initiative in announcing medicare schemes. All provinces have accepted those in one form or another. This was done through the federal spending power—an example of a conditional grant of money, the condition being to maintain certain health standards.

There is so much more that can be said about hospital insurance, diagnostic services, medical care, research and development. It has been a plus. I have suggested that the Canada Pension, Old Age Security, New Horizons and the Bureau of Aging be moved to a department of aging. It may be desirable to include a branch of the National Health Research and Development program so that the department could encourage and allocate its own money to research in the field of geriatrics. There is a special need for training of personnel to deal with aging, and statistics show that these are areas of serious neglect.

I am not going to deal with matters of housing and community services for old people, research and statistics, or co-ordination planning. These are obvious matters that can come under the department. There are various ways to approach it. There are five methods I will take a moment to deal with: First, by a national commission; secondly, a national bureau of aging; thirdly, a federal advisory council on aging; fourthly, a ministry of state; fifthly, a department of aging.

The United Nations has suggested that each country have a national commission on aging. Canada does not have such a commission, although it was suggested in Recommendation 92 in the 1966 Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging. We may well ask ourselves whether it would be appropriate today. It is my view that it would not be. It is much too late now. It would be mainly a co-ordinating body receiving funding from the federal government and open to other donations, but its budget would not really be assured. While it can be said that an advisory committee would be needed, it would seem that the national commission would likely not be a powerful enough body to accomplish the range of decisions that have to be made. Such a body would have virtually no decision-making power, and there is little direct input into the government system.

Secondly, as to the National Bureau of Aging, this is a thinly disguised and smaller version of a national commission, with a proposed budget of $125,000 for salaries and benefits, and $25,000 for non-salary costs. It can perform useful services, but it is likely to be a small office within Health and Welfare, co-ordinating activities mainly in that department, and certainly every sign indicates that it will have no clout itself. A federal advisory council on aging is preferable, in conjunction with a department. It would be a body outside government, which would advise the minister to deal with matters of public interest.

There is a Federal Advisory Council on the Status of Women, though they often claim they have had little effect on improving the status of women, largely because it is ignored by government. Thus we should learn from them that in dealing with the problem of aging we should avoid the mistakes, and, though an advisory council would be welcome, it is not likely to have much effect alone.

As to a ministry of state, the government Organization Bill in 1971, gave power to the government to create ministries and ministers of state when it seemed to the Governor in Council that there was a need to formulate new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matters coming within the responsibility of the Government of Canada. But these ministries were to be short-term; they were to develop policies and not to administer. The long-range plan was then to absorb them into another department or abandon them. The elderly have been abandoned long enough.

A federal department of aging would be headed by a minister responsible to Parliament for the activities of this department. Parliament would direct the spending of this department subject to an estimate. Hiring for the department would be through the Public Service. The administrative head would be the deputy minister, and in order to establish the department there should be something to administer. A number of existing programs could be transferred to such a department—Canada Pension, Old Age Security, Guaranteed Income Supplement and CMHC. In addition, there will be contact co-ordinators to deal interdepartmentally with National Revenue, Employment and Immigration, Health and Welfare, and any other implicated departments. It might also have its own policy and research to administer.

By granting the proposed body departmental status the door is open also to deal with other levels of government, provincial and municipal, in a way which would be much more convincing. Many matters concerned in the question of aging lie within provincial power, such as health and welfare, community programs and housing. The federal involvement here has been because of its spending powers and not because of its initial jurisdiction. Again the tendency today seems to be for decentralization, thereby necessitating a stronger body to co-ordinate the various levels of government on the issue.

What we should avoid is establishing a department similar to that known as the Office of the Co-ordinator on the Status of Women. This body actually has departmental status, but the co-ordinator is deputy head. It is a focal point for federal activities on the status of women and the promotion of equality. It also has liaison functions. It has a budget process and other administrative details to consider. It just doesn't work. It is not effective in solving any of the problems of women. Its function is largely co-ordinating. It lacks the power of a true department. Another consideration is that it deals with only half the problem.

There will be serious changes in the social structure as the youth-oriented society matures. A department of aging could and should plan for this. If Parliament wishes, it is clear that it could set up a federal department of aging.

Putting any constitutional prerogatives aside, the people of Canada need a department of aging because the problem has to be brought forward publicly, and the federal government can speak for all Canadians. By setting up the department, with an advisory committee alongside, the signal would be there for other levels of government to mobilize in areas of concern to them.

Let me close with this. Old people are divided into young-old—those between 65 and 70—and old-old—those over 75. They are the fastest growing segment of our society. This is a social achievement, but it is a shift in the number of people retiring and the number of people employed. It has not only greyed our people, but it has greyed our budget. Today, life expectancy for men is 70 years, and for women 77 years. Life expectancy at 65 is now twelve years for women and five for men, so we have to ask ourselves at what age a person becomes dependent. Sixty-five has always been an arbitrary retirement age based on medical assumptions which medical people now disown and repudiate.

The old-old will have special problems—health and housing—and two-thirds of them are women, widowed and not provided for by husbands' pensions. The new generation of young-old can be involved in the labour force and other community activities. Time, good health, new interests and life for them can really begin at 50. To that end, a minister of aging can give young-old Canadians new hope, and old-old comfort in their declining years. As both the young-old and old-old, you may be able to recognize yourselves sooner or later.

Chairman

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should just like to add, if I may, that the committee held a total of nine meetings and heard 20 witnesses, a number of them on more than one occasion. I should like to thank the members of the committee for the great help they were in considering this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Smith (Colchester) moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 6, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to give you an outline of the work we have in store for next week. We expect that a bill will be introduced on Tuesday evening, and it is possible that Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, will also come before the Senate next week. We shall also continue consideration of the other items presently on the order paper.

The committee schedule for next week is heavy. On Tuesday the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline will meet at 9.30 a.m., and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will meet at 2 p.m., on the subject matter of Bill C-9, the Canada Referendum Act. At 2 o'clock, the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet. At 2.30 p.m., the Standing Committee on National Finance will meet to continue its examination of the estimates of the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion.

On Wednesday, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-37, the income tax amendment bill. That committee will also meet at 2.30 p.m. to consider the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act. The Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline will meet at 2 o'clock, and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has also scheduled a meeting for 2 o'clock to consider the subject matter of Bill C-9. The Subcommittee on Childhood Experiences as Causes of Criminal Behaviour will meet at 4 p.m.

On Thursday, the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 9 a.m., and the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to consider the subject matter of Bill C-37. Also at 9.30 a.m., the National Finance Committee will meet to continue its examination of the estimates of the Department of Regional and Economic Expansion. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 o'clock, and the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline has scheduled a meeting for Thursday when the Senate rises.

Motion agreed to.

SAFETY OF CANADIAN CITIZENS IN IRAN—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this afternoon I have several replies to questions. It may be useful for me to provide those answers today, if honourable senators are prepared to be tolerant with me.

Senator Flynn: As usual.

Senator Perrault: A number of senators have directed inquiries to me and to other ministers with respect to the safety of Canadians in Iran.

I can report to the Senate that the number of Canadians in Iran has fallen from 1,500 in September to approximately 150 at the present time. Although we have had no reports of any of those who remained having been injured, the government has decided, in light of the latest developments in Iran, to remove some dependants and non-essential staff members from the Canadian embassy in Teheran until conditions improve. The embassy is now contacting Canadians in Iran and is reiterating the advice given them at year end to consider leaving if they had no compelling reason to remain.

In view of the probable inability of civil airlines to provide sufficient seats for those wishing to leave, the government is arranging for a Canadian Armed Forces aircraft to be in Ankara tomorrow ready to carry out an evacuation from Teheran as soon as conditions permit.

THE ECONOMY

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROLS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there have been questions asked in the Senate, and a good deal of speculation in the media, on the subject of foreign exchange controls. On behalf of the government, I should like to make the following statement.

The Minister of Finance has stated categorically on several occasions that the government has no intention of introducing foreign exchange controls. Such a system would require a very sizable administrative apparatus, in the view of the government, and would impose a considerable burden on the private sector. Its very existence would serve as a barrier to the international flow of goods, services and capital, which are of such vital importance to Canada, and thus it would ultimately be counterproductive.

The government is concerned about the size of our current account deficit and has taken steps in a number of areas to increase productivity, reduce inflation, and promote efficiency in the Canadian economy. The depreciation of the Canadian dollar has also made an important contribution to improving our international competitiveness. These developments have begun to have an impact on our external position. The growth of export volumes substantially outpaced that of imports in both 1977 and 1978, an improvement which was masked by the adverse price effects of the dollar's depreciation, and we expect further substantial benefits in the future.

While the process of adjustment in the current account is taking place, and in the light of relatively low levels of external borrowing over the last year by provinces, municipalities, and corporations, the federal government has supplemented capital inflows through these channels and has borrowed abroad to replenish reserves lost in the course of maintaining orderly conditions in the exchange market.

May I repeat that the government has no intention of introducing foreign exchange controls?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS AS OBSERVERS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by the Honourable Senator Bell with respect to the attendance of senators as observers at the Federal-Provincial Conference of First Ministers.

The federal government has allocated 25 seats for observers at open portions of such conferences. Of those seats, 23 are reserved for parliamentary observers from the various parties in a ratio determined by party standings in the other place. It is then the responsibility of the various parties to decide how they will distribute the seats.

Members of the Senate, as members of Parliament, have been observers at past conferences, and all senators and members of Parliament in the other place may make representation to their party leader or whip if they wish to attend the Conference of First Ministers.

The agenda for the forthcoming conference is a confidential document at this time. It is restricted to delegates and therefore cannot be distributed. Should the agenda be made public in advance of the meeting, it would, of course, be available to members of the Senate.

GRAIN

DELIVERY TO EXPORT POSITIONS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on January 23 Senator Olson asked whether an agreement had been worked out between the provincial governments, the federal government, the railways and the grain companies, by which we could increase our grain exports and our capability to deliver grain to export positions, especially those on the west coast, and more specifically the port of Prince Rupert.

The federal government and the provincial governments have announced their willingness to assist in the construction of new facilities on the west coast. The federal government expressed the desirability of a new Prince Rupert terminal several years ago, and it has been almost a year now since it announced the availability of $16.3 million for site development costs on Ridley Island at Prince Rupert. The Alberta government recently announced its interest in providing financing for terminal elevator construction. All governments are in agreement that additional capacity on the west coast is desirable.

The actual decision to construct new grain handling facilities at the west coast, however, rests with the private trade.

A consortium of grain-handling companies has been studying the feasibility of constructing a new terminal for several months. It is understood that they are very near making a decision, but that matters such as who will operate the present government terminal and the negotiation of financing must yet be determined.

SANCTIONS AGAINST RHODESIA AND SOUTH AFRICA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, questions were asked by Honourable Senators Forsey and Walker on December 20, 1978, regarding sanctions against Rhodesia and South Africa.

With respect to Rhodesia, Canada is bound by the various resolutions of the UN Security Council, which enacted sanctions against the rebel régime, in particular Resolution 253 of May 29, 1968. These mandatory sanctions, arising from the determination that the Rhodesian situation constituted a threat to international peace and security, include a broad range of political and economic measures designed to bring the full weight of the international community to bear on the régime. Until a satisfactory resolution of the situation is found, involving a real transfer to majority rule and bringing with it international recognition, we do not expect the Security Council to revoke the sanctions.

In November 1977, the Security Council determined that "having regard to the policies and acts of the South African government, the acquisition by South Africa of arms and related matériel constitutes a threat to the maintenance of international peace and security." The council, therefore, acting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, unanimously decided to impose an embargo of arms and related matériel against South Africa.

Canada, which has maintained a voluntary embargo on the export of arms and military equipment to South Africa since 1963—it extended that embargo in 1970 to include the sale of spare parts for such equipment—voted in favour of the Security Council resolution. In doing so, the government confirmed a long-standing Canadian policy.

In the course of his statement on Namibia on November 28 to the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence—Issue No. 1 of Wednesday, November 22 and Tuesday, November 28, pp 1:4-1:21—Mr. Jamieson set out the Canadian position on other types of possible sanctions. He explained the efforts that the Western Five members of the Security Council were making to obtain the co-operation of the South African government to bring about an internationally acceptable settlement in Namibia, and to avoid escalating the issue to the point where sanctions might be unavoidable. At a later point in his statement he stressed that "if there were to be sanctions, they must be taken on an international basis." He also underlined the detrimental effects that sanctions against South Africa would have against the neighbouring African states.

Mr. Jamieson, while not ruling out consideration of the question of sanctions, made it clear that our primary objective was to seek a peaceful settlement of the Namibia dispute, and that a decision by the Canadian government on the question of sanctions would have to be taken in the light of prevailing circumstances as well as the sort of sanctions contemplated, and their implications.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE ON MAIL TO ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL OVERSEAS—
QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, questions have been asked about the use of the social insurance number on mail to armed forces personnel overseas.

[Senator Perrault.]

● (1420)

Prior to January 1, 1968, each service—navy, army and air force—utilized a different identifying number system; for example, navy 56432-H, army SB 153805, air force 226012. There were also different formats used within each service for officers, men and reserve forces. With the commencement of the integration of the three services, the adoption of a single system of identifying numbers became essential. Rather than introduce an additional system, it was decided in the interests of efficiency and the convenience of service members to utilize the existing SIN number for this purpose.

This was a departmental decision made by management, and there was and is no requirement to seek the approval of individual members of the armed forces.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REISMAN REPORT ON THE CANADIAN AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on December 12, 1978, Senator Bosa asked the following question:

If I may direct a question to the Leader of the Government, now that the government has received the Reisman report on the automotive manufacturing industry in Canada, is it the intention of the government to consult the industries affected before formulating its policy on the matter?

Parties affected by the recommendations contained in the Reisman report on the Canadian automotive industry were invited to make known their views prior to government considering these recommendations. Submissions have been received from provincial governments and from associations representing vehicle manufacturers, parts manufacturers and material suppliers. The Automotive Sector Task Force has met and provided the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with its views. The minister will be meeting with a labour delegation in early February. The views expressed will be carefully weighed before any policy is finalized.

BELL CANADA—OWNERSHIP OF CONTROLLING INTEREST IN IRAN—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On January 24 the Honourable Senator Norrie asked the following question:

Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the government leader. Could he find out—I am asking this question on behalf of someone who has sought this information from me—who owns the controlling shares of Bell Canada in Iran? Is it Canada or Iran?

I have now been informed by Bell Canada that Bell Canada has no holdings in Iran and does no business there. It is possible that Bell Canada has been confused with U.S. Bell.

TRANSPORT

APPLICATIONS FOR POSITIONS AS STEWARDS AND STEWARDESSES WITH AIR CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On January 24 the Honourable Senator Marshall asked a question regarding applications for positions as stewards and stewardesses with Air Canada.

Air Canada received more than 9,000 applications for the position of flight attendant in 1977, confirming the information which the senator presented to the Senate. Although there were no vacancies that year, 35 of these applicants were interviewed for possible future employment.

The airline did not recruit applicants through advertising in 1977 or in 1978.

A high percentage of these spontaneous applicants, as they are described, do not meet the basic minimum requirements for the position which is indicated on the application form.

In 1978 the airline hired 171 flight attendants, and anticipates it will hire some 400 more to meet the requirements for the summer peak period of 1979. To this end Air Canada is currently recruiting through paid advertising to find the best possible people to fill these positions.

HALIBUT FISHING INDUSTRY—INTERIM AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: On January 24 last the Honourable Senator Austin asked a question about the Canada-U.S. maritime boundaries fishery negotiations. Other senators have made inquiries on this subject as well. Senator Austin is not here this afternoon—

Senator Flynn: As usual.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is an early date on this particular reply, and I believe it to be in the interests of the Senate that I should give the answer at this time.

Senator Flynn: I do not mind. I just wanted to tease you about the usual attendance of Senator Austin.

Senator Perrault: I understand Senator Austin is in Ottawa today. He probably slipped out of the chamber temporarily.

Senator Austin's question was as follows:

My question to the government leader is whether it would be possible for Canadian and American negotiators to effect an interim agreement, for this year at least, with respect to the halibut fishery on the Pacific coast, so that in the fishing season, which starts within the next month or two, a very serious economic loss to British Columbia fishermen can be prevented.

Honourable senators, I can report that Canadian and U.S. negotiators will be meeting in Ottawa on February 6 to explore the possibilities of either a permanent or an interim west coast fishery agreement, and in particular the question of Canadian access to halibut in U.S. waters.

EAST COAST FISHERIES—CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable Senator Marshall asked a similar question, as follows:

Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the same subject concerning the evident agreement on the east coast between Canada and the United States. The Leader of the Government indicated that temporary boundaries would be designated. Is there any possibility of our getting the information, and, indeed, a map, showing the boundaries that have been established on the east coast of Canada between Canada and the United States in the fisheries cold war?

The question of an agreement on a temporary east coast maritime boundary is inaccurate. The Canadian and U.S. special negotiators have recommended a permanent east coast fishing agreement and that the question of maritime boundary delimitation be referred to binding third party settlement procedures. Pending the coming into force of the fisheries agreement, fishermen of both countries continue to fish in the disputed area of the Georges Bank.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I am not clear whether the answer of the Leader of the Government included an indication that the settlement of disputes as to boundaries on the east coast would be referred to arbitration or some similar procedure.

Senator Perrault: I can only repeat that negotiators on both sides of the line have recommended a permanent east coast fishing agreement and that the question of maritime boundary delimitation be referred to binding third party settlement procedures, which could conceivably take some time.

EAST COAST FISHERIES—CANADA-FRANCE AGREEMENT—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: I can understand and appreciate that negotiations between Canada and the United States will be mutually beneficial. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could extract information about conflicts that have been the result of ongoing negotiations between France and Canada concerning St. Pierre and Miquelon and the boundaries that should be established there beneficial to both countries, particularly Newfoundland.

Senator Perrault: A report will be brought to the Senate on that subject just as soon as it is available.

THE ECONOMY

FOREIGN EXCHANGE RESERVES—QUESTION

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, there have been a number of statements recently indicating that the accumulated foreign exchange reserves are depleted, and they are now being replenished only by further borrowings from abroad. Could the Leader of the Government confirm whether that is the present situation?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have the current up-to-date information on that subject, but that information will be sought from the Department of Finance.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

PUBLIC SESSIONS—QUESTION

Senator Manning: Could the Leader of the Government advise how many of the sessions at the First Ministers' Conference will be open to the public, or is the entire conference closed?

Senator Perrault: I can only repeat that there will be a greater percentage of private sessions than there were at the last meeting in Ottawa. I cannot give the exact allocation of private sessions in relation to public sessions.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

PROPOSED STUDY OF USE—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government indicate if the government has established a commission to consider the uses to which the social insurance number may be put on a compulsory basis in the public and private sectors; if so, what are the terms of reference of such commission, who are its members and when it is expected to report?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the matter has been under discussion, and consideration is being given to the proposal of having that subject studied. Indeed, it has been suggested that this might be a subject that could be studied by the Senate, but no decision has been taken.

GRAIN

INITIAL PRAIRIE PRICES—QUESTION

Senator Olson: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government respecting the initial prices for grain to be paid on the prairies. What I am interested in is the date on which producers can expect an announcement, because in recent press releases the minister responsible for the Wheat Board has talked about a rather substantial final payment for the year that has just ended. He indicated that this had improved because export prices increased in the latter part of 1978. This fact would also have an effect on the amount that will be offered in the initial prices for the coming season. Could the leader obtain an early announcement respecting that date so that producers will know it in advance of seeding?

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, January 30, the debate on the consideration of the first report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand: Honourable senators, I do wish I could spare you the speech I intend to make this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Marchand: Simply because you will find it repetitious. Some no doubt will think that enough time has already been spent on this issue. But because of the reasons which prompted me to come into federal politics in 1965 and to become a member of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, and because for more than 15 years, I have been concerned with the Canadian linguistic duality and its related problems, you will understand that it would be very difficult for me not to comment the report of the Pepin-Robarts task force. My views on the matter—whatever you may think of them—are expressed in earnest and in a non-partisan way. By this I mean that I am not here to protect anyone. I think those who have to defend themselves are quite able to do it alone and that they will, otherwise they will bear the consequences.

I think that the problem we are now experiencing in this beautiful country of ours has existed for so long, it is surprising that, in 1979, we should be studying a report from a public commission of inquiry. As a matter of fact, some attempts have been made to correct the situation. However the leaders of our country, those who have been chosen to lead the Canadian people, namely, the members of the House of Commons, Parliament, the various governments, are probably those who are the least active in the area I wish to deal with.

I have no intention of analyzing the Pepin-Robarts report as a whole. Everyone of you can read it if you have not already done so. That report is intelligent. It is rational. In short, I think it is honest. It is disinterested. Still, it reminds me of a small blue flower under glass: it is pretty to look at, but there is no scent.

As for the technical analysis my colleague, Senator Lamontagne, made of it, an analysis that could interest the Senate, I do not intend to repeat it. But I do think he felt it was necessary in order to demonstrate to what extent it was impossible in practice to create or establish such a Council of the Federation which, in fact, does not belong in our democratic and parliamentary structures as we know them now, and as they have always been conceived. It reminds me somewhat of the very simple story—I do not know whether it exists in English, but this is the way it goes in French: What is a camel? A camel is a horse sketched by a committee. So, what is the Council of the Federation? Precisely that: a horse sketched by a committee.

In any event, I do not intend to go into that part in depth. I should like to establish what contribution the task force has made to the debate which has been going on for a long time and which, to my mind, is on the wrong track and will lead nowhere in good time. The Pepin-Robarts task force has decided—like several others, because it is not the only one, even at the government level—that the main problem in Canada is a constitutional one. So, if it is a constitutional problem, let us look at those constitutional problems. That strikes me as logical enough. So, when the provincial premiers meet with the federal government, what do they talk about? Well, they talk about the constitutional problems facing this country; about the frictions that may exist, for example, over the federal spending power; about the declaratory power, the amending formula, and so on. Finally, I think there are enough former premiers here to know what the discussions are all about.

Strangely enough for me who attended those discussions—and you too, for that matter, who sat on the other side—in the past 15 years no member of the public has talked to me about the declaratory power in the Constitution. Nobody has ever talked to me about the federal spending power—never. Indeed, it was a revelation when the Prime Minister maintained it was extremely important that we patriate the Constitution. Some did not even know that it was in London. So I say to you that if our country is divided, well I am sorry but I am not at all convinced that it is a constitutional matter. I am not saying that there are no constitutional problems. Indeed, there are real constitutional problems.

There are constitutional problems that keep evolving because if you take the federal spending power, for example, perhaps that spending power of the federal government should be reassessed today. I agree with the provinces that are asking for that. Why? Because when the federal government enters a particular field, it forces as a consequence provincial governments to make considerable expenditures that very often the provinces cannot afford. So, that will have to be adjusted. But to say that in the past it was an acute problem that might explain the frictions between francophones and anglophones, well, that is going too far, because it was under the spending power set out in the Constitution that nearly all our social security system in Canada was set up. It was that power that made old age pensions possible in 1927. I read in an article written by Mr. Claude Morin, the great Parti Québécois strategist, that there was a continuity in the PQ government's policy that went back to Taschereau in 1927 who had refused old age pensions because it was an intrusion in provincial affairs. That is not true. They were indeed refused by Mr. Taschereau for the simple reason that it was not customary for francophones to ask government support for senior citizens. It was a family obligation. This has nothing whatsoever to do with the Constitution. That's the way it is. Indeed, it is rather funny, taking that example, to realize who accepted old age pensions. The nationalist Mr. Duplessis. He thought it was a very good deal but he certainly did not suggest any amendment to the Constitution.

Senator Flynn: He was forced into it.

Senator Marchand: I would not like people to say that I did not understand anything. I would not want people to think that I am stupid and say, "Look at Marchand; he thinks there are no constitutional problems". Of course there are. Some of them have been created by the provinces—for example when they decided to go into the area of international relations, which is a federal jurisdiction.

That is why I am saying that there are constitutional problems but they vary considerably. For instance, there is the declaratory power of the Constitution. I have discovered this question here in Ottawa. Well, I am supposed to be educated and I have a social science degree. I have spent 23 years in Quebec public life and with the trade-union movement. But the first time I heard of it I was wondering what was that declaratory power? Then I understood there were new developments. Uranium had been discovered. Petroleum had been discovered and it was extremely important for the provinces involved to protect their interests in these areas. I understood it very well. But to say that this is at the root of difficulties which face English-speaking and French-speaking people, is to ignore what Canada is all about. The problem is real, but this is not the reason why English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians—at least, this is absolutely true as far as French-speaking Canadians are concerned—feel uncomfortable with the state of their Constitution or with public life in Canada? Why do they feel this way? There might be hundreds of reasons which have nothing to do with the Constitution and that the Pepin-Robarts task force has ignored because to them it was not very important. You think it is not important? You think that when a B.C. minister, in 1979, in the middle of a crisis, decides to write a song on "frogs" it has no impact in the province of Quebec? I tell you it has more impact than all the constitutional amendments you might propose.

You think that in Alberta—you will tell me that they are marginal groups—I am convinced that they are marginal but it has serious consequences, like when you scratch an old wound it hurts much more than if you do it on healthy skin. Furthermore, when in Calgary the stickers said, "Let them freeze in the East," they meant us; when in Toronto people booed in a large stadium because French was used, some said it was only a small group. Yes, but if it had been the only incidents since the beginning of Confederation, I would say: After all, it is not so important, we should not take it seriously. But I could give you many other examples for hours and hours. We must try to change that behaviour, that attitude.

Now, there has been the problem of air traffic controllers. It was in 1977 or 1976, I do not remember exactly, but there was a problem with those people. I admit that there was a technical problem, but we did not say right away, "Well the air traffic controllers are wrong. Let us find a technical way to solve that problem." But we had to set up another inquiry commission to determine if it was possible to speak French in the air. It was the first time that a language other than English was spoken in the air. You see? All those things are extremely important. It seems that the others, the anglophones, even in the province of Quebec, do not realize how important this problem is. There is no malice in this. I shall give you a very simply example. The Gazette—it is not me who wrote it, it is the Gazette—published the following headline a week ago, and I quote:

"Two solitudes come to the West Island"

Some English people moved out of the "West end". Thus, some houses are vacant. They were bought by French Canadians because, I understand, they were rather inexpensive and they settled there. The Gazette took an interest in the problem. It asked questions. An old lady was asked if she noticed that some French Canadians had moved to the Western part of Montreal. I am not talking about Vancouver. I am not referring to Saskatoon. I am talking about Montreal where there are 1.5 million French-speaking people. What did the lady answer? I shall mention her name because it has been made public.

[English]

"I have noticed French people moving into the community," Margaret Moore O'Meara of Baie d'Urfe said in an interview this week.

"I heard someone speaking French on the street the other day and it surprised me slightly. But I really can't say I'm bothered about it."

● (1450)

[Translation]

Of course, I bear no grudge against this old lady. But if in 1979, after all that has happened, it should be surprising to hear French spoken in the city of Montreal, well there must be something wrong. Anyway, I do not intend to list all possible grievances. I will simply say that after serving on the Laurendeau-Dunton commission, I remember the question asked by André Laurendeau—and those who knew him are very lucky, because André Laurendeau was, to my mind, a great Canadian. He was witty, sensitive, extremely honest and objective. So I was saying that during all our travels across Canada, the question we kept asking ourselves was: Do these two peoples really want to live together? That was the question.

So if you were to ask me what is the ideal solution to this problem, I would tell you there is no ideal solution to such a problem. That is the basic error of the Pepin-Robarts task force. There is no ideal solution to all this. The only possible solution is the one the major components of the country are prepared to accept. It is the only solution. What is the ideal collective agreement? There is no such thing. There is only people who agree on certain basic principles, on a certain framework, and who say: Well, we are ready to accept this framework and to live with it considering the values involved. That is the ideal formula. So what is the ideal formula for Canada? There are some who have said, "At last, we have found it." So we asked Mr. Robarts and Mr. Pepin, two politicians, and they found a solution. It is ideal. It is clear. It looks good on paper. But immediately, the Prime Minister of Canada said, "Listen, there are some parts that we could never accept."

Mr. Lévesque said, "Well, you are afraid of a special status." The reply was immediate: "You are afraid of economic integration into Canada." Because, according to the PQ, if French culture is to be saved, some economic control is required. Which goes against the Pepin-Robarts position.

[Senator Marchand.]

So for whom, then, is it an ideal solution? If francophones do not want it, and if anglophones do not want it, who wants it? I am telling you there is no ideal solution. We must find a solution that will prove acceptable to the people and that we, as politicians, will be able to "sell" to them.

This will not be done successfully by university professors, former ministers or even former prime ministers or senators. This is not the way things work. It is the people, through their voices, who will make their desires known when electing their representative. What can I say? There are 265 members in the House, and how many in the provincial governments? The same thing goes for prime ministers. The people must have leadership but if none of these gentlemen knows how to do it, then something is wrong.

All kinds of studies have been made on the Constitution—the Laurendeau-Dunton commission, the Pepin-Robarts commission, and now in our wisdom, we have created a committee on the Constitution, a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, also to study the Constitution. We, in the Senate, have established another one: the Senate Committee on the Constitution. Following a meeting of the premiers during which difficulties arose we established a sub-committee on the Constitution. We certainly do not lack for committees on the Constitution. How wonderful it will be. We will have the best Constitution in the world. But based on our history, I wonder if Canadians are ready to go along with it, to put an end to quarrels between French and English Canadians; if they are ready to live together in harmony.

If every time I speak French in a federal institution it is an anomaly, if French-speaking civil servants feel uncomfortable in their working environment, if problems such as those experienced by air traffic controllers are a daily occurrence, then you can change the Constitution whichever way you want and it will be of no use. Frictions will remain. This is inevitable. I am not blaming those who did the research or those who worked for the task force. I am convinced that they are honest and intelligent people. They did try to find a solution to the problem. But tell me now, who is going to agree with such a solution? Mr. Bennett from British Columbia, because the task force somewhat recommended his approach with regard to the Senate? He found these recommendations excellent and this is not surprising since they were his. I have no objection. But are we really going to do to Canada what the task force calls for?

I do not know too many governments who agreed they would follow such a course. Then what are we going to do? Some day sooner or later when we have finished with all our commissions, when all the necessary information on constitutional matters has been gathered, we will have to face the question: How far are Canadians ready to go? Furthermore is any political party prepared to jeopardize its future on these fundamental issues? This is the kind of reasoning we will have to apply: we want to build our country in this fashion because we know it well. We have had enough studies, enough research and we do know what the main problems are. Mind you, certain things will only disappear with time. Some prejudices will not die whether we like it or not in spite of all the reports, constitutional texts or whatever. Of course, French-speaking Canadians have some prejudices but English-speaking Canadians do too.

● (1500)

Do not believe that English-speaking Canadians are the only ones to be prejudiced. Both sides are. When someone speaks English, French Canadians say that it is an English Canadian, but sometimes it is an American. They cannot always see the difference. We are dominated by an anglophone economy. However, the economy is not managed solely by English-speaking Canadians, but often by Americans and we do not make the distinction. This is an example of prejudice.

Of course, our political and religious leaders failed to understand what was going on in our society for quite a long time, because when they were asking us to go back to the land as they did—and I saw this myself—from 1930 to 1940, they should perhaps have told us: Go to the cities, work in the industries because they are the source of progress. I could go on about this for a long time.

As for the Pepin-Robarts report, I simply wish to congratulate its authors. They were given their terms of reference and they worked in good faith. I am not blaming them personally. They were given certain terms of reference and worked within this framework as well as they could. Was it wise to establish a new commission? If it had been up to me, I would not have created any commission. I regret what has happened. However, the commission was established and I think that one was enough. In any case, the commission was created and submitted its report.

However, and this is my main point, honourable senators, the Pepin-Robarts report is a very good working paper. Excellent research work has been made. However, I believe that it is going a bit far to present it to the Canadian people as if it were the find of the century, as some people would say. I do not believe this to be true. It is quite simply a nice constitutional model which is perhaps just as worthy as the others. Yet in my opinion it is not the formula which will make people right the wrongs of the past.

Senator Lamontagne: It is not even a model, it is a puzzle.

Senator Marchand: Yes, indeed. Anyway I do not blame those who were there or anybody in particular. I simply say that it is not the way to solve this problem, if ever it gets solved.

Furthermore, while all these studies are being carried out—and it is the same thing for the reform of the Senate incidentally. Many people are talking about it. This subject is often discussed in this place. However, honourable senators, my opinion on this matter is very simple and it is that if we do not have the courage to tell the government: Well, here is how we want to reform the Senate and we will fight for that, no need to do anything else—if we are not prepared to do that, let us not expect others to solve our problems or if they do then they will solve them in a way which will not be satisfactory for us. So, if we wait for everybody to express his opinion on the Senate, many of us will be dead by then and perhaps the Senate as well will have had enough time to wither with us. Will it be a good or a bad thing? I do not know. Anyway, we are aware of the fact that there is a problem. It has already been studied and, just as with the Constitution issue, I think that it has been sufficiently studied.

Furthermore, as it is being studied and as enquiries are being made, since we are now going to study the Pepin-Robarts report, there are other people who are busy organizing. They are organizing in order to make their ideas win support. They cannot be blamed. I cannot blame them for that. Why should I blame them anyway? They are politicians. They have been elected and they are now plotting their strategy. It is clear that this is what they are doing. It is clear that the Parti Québécois needed time to get organized. It is taking advantage of all these delays. It is taking an enormous advantage of it. I know you are going to tell me that it should not be so. Do you think we would not be doing the same thing if we were in their shoes? Of course we would. There is no doubt about it. The only strategic error we are making is that we are giving time to the others to organize properly. What the PQ is seeking is obviously to keep the support which it accidentally gained in 1974.

Some Hon. Senators: In 1976.

Senator Marchand: In 1976 indeed, on November 14.

Some Hon. Senators: On the 15th.

Senator Marchand: On the 15th, I should know better.

Senator Flynn: It is a nightmare.

Senator Marchand: No, I even forgot that nightmare. There are some people saying, and I have heard the Premier of Quebec say it too: You want to steal our victory! I do not want to steal Mr. Lévesque's victory. However he knew perfectly well there was discontent in the province of Quebec at that time, and he was the only one who stood to gain, in view especially of his assurance that this would not lead to separation. So he gained from that general discontent. What was that discontent? You had genuine separatists, genuine independentists, there is no doubt about that. There still are. But they were joined by a lot of people who had reason to be dissatisfied.

Some Hon. Senators: With Bourassa.

Senator Marchand: With Bourassa, of course, and also at times with the federal government, because the people do not react that way. Farmers were furious because of the dairy policy; the English were furious because of Bill 22. The people were furious because of hospital strikes; others were furious because of university strikes. There was unemployment. There was inflation. Everyone had a good reason not to be satisfied. And they made their dissatisfaction known. But surely it is going too far to suggest that a vote was a vote for Quebec sovereignty. Once they were in power, they took that opportunity, as any other political party would have done, and they are getting organized while we are studying the matter. I think they are smarter than we are. They are getting organized at the regional level and the local level, and we here are getting ready to study the task force report, to establish whether there is not somewhere in the declaratory power something that would unite Canada.

Honourable senators, the road to hell is paved with political speeches made by speakers who could not stop speaking before the revolution came. Not wishing to imitate them, I will conclude by saying in summary that this is another report. We have had enough reports. This is a report made by honest people. I have nothing against them. It is simply a working paper that could be useful to those who will work at reconstructing the country in such a way that all components may live in relative happiness. But it is no more than that. Really, it is not the ideal solution inspired by the Holy Spirit, as has been suggested in some circles.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE—QUESTION

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have just received a copy of the annual report on government annuities for 1977-78 in which it is stated that the Government Annuities Improvement Act of December 1975 increased the interest rate from 4 per cent to 7 per cent on annuities which had not yet matured. The report also states—and this is most welcome—that the rate of return is to be reviewed periodically, depending on future variations in interest rates.

My question to the leader is whether such a review is contemplated and whether, in view of the fact that there has been a substantial increase in interest rates generally, the government is considering a higher return on those matured government annuities?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES—NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE FRANCHISES—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, this week might almost be taken as Hockey Week in Canada; at least the end of the week will certainly be one that is important to international hockey.

In the light of the announcement by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport that the federal government is prepared to subsidize some aspects of professional sport, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a four-part question in connection with hockey. I must apologize for not giving the leader notice of my question, but, frankly, I did not get round to it until it was too late.

1. Are the four cities of Winnipeg, Hamilton, Quebec and Edmonton the only cities to be considered for a grant of several million dollars?

2. If so, does that not discriminate against any other city which might expect to work towards entry into the National Hockey League?

3. Will the government give equal treatment to Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal, cities which previously financed their own arenas at great cost?

4. In view of the financial losses to be expected in the cities mentioned for capital grants, has the government given any undertaking to provide annual subsidies to the operations so that the thousands of people who build their hopes and pride on those franchises will not be misled and bitterly disappointed?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in view of Senator Molson's extensive and honourable association with hockey over the years, the questions he has posed are of some importance.

First of all, I appreciate the opportunity to state on behalf of the government that the offer of certain grants to a list of specified cities in Canada for arena extension and expansion, should entry into the NHL be granted to these cities, does not exclude the possibility of similar grants being made to other centres across Canada where certain sports facilities are required.

Among a number of important conditions, the government has established the policy that wherever such arenas are established, expanded or extended they must be made available for amateur sport. The announcement last Friday by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport related solely to those areas where there has been a considerable degree of public enthusiasm for the idea of applying for entry into the NHL, but other types of assistance in other centres are not excluded.

Furthermore, I should like to state that the availability of federal government assistance under certain other conditions—some of the conditions, I understand, being supplementary and additional support from local governments and provincial governments—is perhaps one of the less significant factors in determining in the ultimate whether Quebec, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Hamilton shall be granted entry into the NHL. I understand that there is a substantial list of other complex and major conditions that would have to be met before any additional franchises would be granted in the National Hockey League.

As honourable senators may be aware, the existence of improved arena facilities does not assure the automatic entry into the NHL of any of these cities. In my view, it would be grossly unfair to other population centres in Canada if the government were to allot funds derived from Loto Canada or from any other taxpayer source exclusively for the purposes of extending and expanding the National Hockey League in this country. The government has indicated that where there is national significance associated with the expansion of certain arena or stadium facilities anywhere in Canada, and where there is financial participation assured from other levels of government, and where amateur groups are going to be benefited, other proposals will be considered. I shall be pleased to attempt to clarify the matter further should the honourable senator not be satisfied with the response.

Senator Flynn: Is that the final answer?

Senator Perrault: There is no such thing as a final answer.

INCOME TAX

ALLEGED GARNISHEING OF CHILD TAX CREDIT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on January 30 a question was asked by Senator Marshall, who on that occasion expressed serious concern about the child tax credit and amendments to the Family Allowances Act, 1973. He asked for confirmation concerning the benefit of $200 per child directed to the mothers in lower income categories in cases where families, for justifiable reasons, may have fallen behind in their income tax obligations.

While the combined income of husband and wife is used to determine the amount of the child tax credit, the child tax credit is paid to the wife, assuming she is the recipient of the family allowance cheque, regardless of any tax liability of her husband. However, if the wife should herself have a tax liability, the child tax credit would be withheld to offset her liability. But, in the words of Revenue Canada officials, "to be perfectly clear," if she owes no tax she will receive the whole credit she is entitled to, even if her husband has tax owing.

Honourable senators, I hope that is clear.

Senator Grosart: Very clear.

THE ECONOMY

FOREIGN EXCHANGE RESERVES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have an answer to the question asked on February 1 by Honourable Senator Manning. I think this information should be put on the record because other senators have asked similar questions. Senator Manning said:

—there have been a number of statements recently indicating that the accumulated foreign exchange reserves are depleted, and they are now being replenished only by further borrowings from abroad.

He asked for a report on the present situation.

Statements that Canada's official foreign exchange reserves have been "depleted," as cited by Senator Manning, are incorrect. I have been provided with a copy of the monthly statement on Canada's reserves for January which was issued last Friday. It shows that our total reserves as of the end of January amounted to U.S. $4.4 billion. The release also provides a breakdown of this total.

Honourable senators, I would be prepared to include this as part of today's Debates of the Senate if honourable senators should so desire.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: The statement is as follows:

Friday, February 2, 1979

Official International Reserves

Finance Minister Jean Chrétien announced today the level and composition of Canada's official international reserves on January 31, 1979, as follows:

(Millions of U.S. Dollars)

U.S. Dollars	2,139.5
Other Foreign Currencies	20.6
Gold	995.6
Special Drawing Rights	696.9
Reserve Position in IMF	547.6
Total:
January 31, 1979	4,400.2
December 31, 1978	4,566.2
Change	-166.0

The change in reserves in January included a decrease of $30.3 million in SDR-denominated assets reflecting depreciation of the U.S. dollar value of the SDR.

The change also included an increase of U.S. $183.9 million representing the $141.1 million SDRs allotted to Canada in the context of an SDR allocation by the IMF to its members.

There were no drawings on the standby credit facilities. On January 31, 1979, drawings outstanding on the facility with Canadian chartered banks totalled U.S. $1.4 billion and, on the facility with U.S. and other foreign banks, U.S. $1.3 billion.

The reserves as of January 31 do not include any amounts from the borrowing in the Japanese capital market that is currently being negotiated.

FISHERIES

REPORT OF SINCLAIR COMMISSION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on January 25 the Honourable Senator Williams asked a question in these words:

I understand that the report of the Sinclair Commission, which has been studying licensing with respect to fisheries in the Pacific region, has been in the hands of the government for some time. When will that report be made available to the public?

The Sinclair Report titled "A Licensing and Fee System for the Coastal Fisheries of British Columbia" will be available to the public as soon as the arrangements for printing and distribution, which are now under way, have been completed.

[Later]

FISH PROCESSING AT SEA—QUESTION

Senator Williams: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a further question relating to fishing off the Pacific coast.

Recently it was announced that a vessel costing $4 million would be operating within the 200-mile fishing economic zone off the Pacific coast. It will pack the catch with modern equipment and the product will be sold in a market of the owner's choice according to the market's requirements. In the past, there has been no provision in the legislation and regulations for the processing of catches at sea; in fact, it is prohibited.

Taking into consideration the fact that we now have the report of the Sinclair Commission on a licensing and fee system for the coastal fisheries of British Columbia, I should like to know how it is possible for this group to be permitted to fish and process their catch at sea. What legislation is there to make this possible?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

AIR CANADA

FUNCTIONS OF CHAIRMAN AND PRESIDENT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: A question has been asked about the functions of the Chairman and the President of Air Canada, and there has been interest shown by honourable senators with respect to recent changes in those positions.

I can state that the two Air Canada senior executive positions of Chairman and President were, as honourable senators are aware, established more than 10 years ago. Pierre Taschereau resigned from his post as Chairman of the Board as he wished to lighten his business responsibilities and concentrate on personal endeavours. He will continue as a member of the Air Canada board.

The prime responsibility of the Chairman—now the responsibility of the Honourable Bryce Mackasey—is to provide leadership and organization of the board, ensuring a proper structure for the board to enable it to carry out its role of representing the shareholders. Apart from his board responsibilities, Mr. Mackasey acts as adviser to the President and Chief Executive Officer, and carries out activities related to the development of corporate policies. In particular, he provides guidance to the airline on its social and political responsibilities and purposes.

The President and Chief Executive Officer carries the full responsibility for the overall management of the airline. He is responsible for the interpretation and implementation of broad policies approved by the Board of Directors, the translation of the corporation's mission into strategies, organization design and practices, specific objectives and detailed policies for the operation of the company. As the sole member of both management and the board, he represents each to the other, and is responsible for maintaining a smooth and efficient working relationship.

As a commercial crown corporation, Air Canada considers the salaries of its executive management to be proprietary information.

Senator Flynn: The leader said that these positions were established 10 years ago. Unless I am mistaken, when Mr. Pratte was Chairman of the Board he was also the Chief Executive Officer. Mr. Claude Taylor was in a secondary position to him. I think it is the reverse now. Unless I am wrong, the present situation does not go back 10 years.

● (2025)

Senator Perrault: I understand there have been recent re-definitions and clarifications in the roles and responsibilities of the Chairman, President and Chief Executive Officer of Air Canada in order to ensure a more efficient operation of the airline.

Senator Flynn: Then you do not maintain that these were defined 10 years ago?

SUGGESTED SALE TO PRIVATE INTERESTS—QUESTION

Senator Marchand: I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Is the statement by Mr. Taylor to the effect that it would be a good thing to sell Air Canada to private interests the policy of the government, or is it an idea Mr. Taylor entertains himself; if so, was he advised on this by Mr. Mackasey?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that one member of the cabinet did suggest the possibility of selling some Air Canada shares to the private sector. However, I must take the question as notice and provide a fuller explanation at a later date.

Senator Grosart: That is very wise.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps Mr. Taylor was not consulted on the appointment of Mr. Mackasey.

TRANSPORT

EQUIPMENT PURCHASED BY VIA RAIL FROM CNR—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

taurant cars, pullman cars and coaches have been assigned by Canadian National Railways to VIA Rail, and at what cost?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

The following CNR equipment was purchased by VIA Rail at a total cost (net book value) of $52,022,642:

- 120 locomotives
- 44 rail diesel cars
- 741 passenger cars (all types)
- 90 steam and electric generators.

EQUIPMENT PURCHASED BY VIA RAIL FROM CPR—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 18—By Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche):

With reference to the amalgamation of rail passenger service in Canada to form one service called "VIA Rail," how many locomotives, rail diesel cars, parlor cars, restaurant cars, pullman cars and coaches have been assigned by Canadian Pacific Railways to VIA Rail, and at what cost?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

The following CPR equipment was purchased by VIA Rail at a total cost (net book value) of $13,657,627:

- 28 locomotives
- 38 rail diesel cars
- 197 passenger cars (all types).

COMPENSATION TO CNR AND CPR FOR USE OF THEIR EXISTING FACILITIES—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 19—By Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche):

With reference to the amalgamation of railway passenger service in Canada to form one service called "VIA Rail," will VIA Rail compensate Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railways for the use of their existing facilities already in service?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

Yes, at rates consistent with Costing Order R-6313 of the Canadian Transport Commission.

FISHERIES

ANNUAL SEAL HUNT—MAGDALEN ISLANDS SEALERS—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 28—By Senator Marshall:

1. How many sealers in the Magdalen Islands derive a livelihood from Canada's annual seal hunt?
2. What is the reaction of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment or the Member of Parliament concerned to the reported offer of millionaire Franz Weber to pay sealers $80,000.00 per year if they vote to renounce the seal hunt, and is this matter being investigated, and, if not, why not?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

1. One thousand five hundred and twenty-five sealer's licences were issued in the Magdalen Islands in 1978.

2. We understand that Mr. Franz Weber had, in September 1978, offered approximately $50.00 to each Magdalen Islands sealer licenced in 1978 if he would not hunt seals in 1979. This amount would not offset the income derived by these fishermen from sealing last year. Mr. Weber further proposed that a referendum on sealing be conducted in the Magdalen Islands by its county council. The council referred this proposal to the Magdalen Islands Sealers Association, which recommended against holding the proposed referendum. At its November 29, 1978, meeting, the Magdalen Islands County Council decided that Mr. Weber's proposed referendum would not be held.

OFF-TRACK BETTING

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STUDY BY LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault moved, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 6, 1979:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the feasibility of implementing a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada and any matter relating thereto, and, in particular,

(a) the economic effect such a system would have on the horse racing industry and on the distribution of industry revenues, particularly the revenues from pari-mutuel betting;

(b) the concept, structure and effectiveness of a so-called "home marketing area" for each track, with particular reference to equitability and enforceability;

(c) the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented; and

(d) the effect of such a system on society, its potential as a marketing tool of the industry and whether it would result in a reduction of illegal betting; and

● (2030)

He said: Honourable senators, off-track betting is a subject of considerable interest to thousands of Canadians from coast to coast. Horse racing is a popular sport in many parts of Canada, and has been since before Confederation; indeed since the very presence of man on this continent. Whether it be thoroughbred racing or standard-bred pacing at the harness tracks in various parts of Canada, many Canadians regard horse racing as an exciting and popular pastime.

The Senate, with its function and tradition of representing the regional interests of Canada—

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: —is perhaps the ideal forum to investigate a matter which has been debated without conclusion for a number of years. Here is an opportunity for the Senate to demonstrate its interest in the significant problems of all Canadians, wherever they live and whatever their problems may be.

Senators will recall that the introduction of illegal messenger services in Canadian cities in the late 1960s prompted a serious look at legalized off-track betting. These messenger services advertised their intention to take wagers from the public. They would do that for a fee and take the money out to the tracks. In other words, they would perform a service for people who wanted to bet but did not want to be or could not be physically at the race track.

Those services were found to be illegal, but the practice demonstrated that a market for off-track betting existed and, in fact, legislation was introduced in 1972 only to die on the order paper.

Today, over six years later, the question is still unresolved. There has been much study undertaken, much debate, and many stories in the media, but no decision.

I think it is to the credit of the Senate that the Minister of Agriculture—who at times in the past has made certain uncomplimentary remarks about the Senate, but who now obviously recognizes its value—has agreed that the Senate be asked to study the matter and make recommendations. It is recognition of the valuable investigative capacity and the flexibility of our committees that we have been asked to do this. Of course, it will add to the heavy committee workload, but by undertaking this study the Senate will once again show to the public that this house is prepared, when asked and requested, to make a worthwhile contribution to varied aspects of Canadian life.

The wording of this motion shows that the committee's work will need to be comprehensive and definitive. The racing industry itself has spent a lot of time and money arguing the pros and cons of off-track betting. Certainly the time has arrived for a solution, one way or the other.

First, the motion calls for studying the economic effect on the industry of legalized off-track betting and the distribution of revenues. Some racing centres argue that their costs are spiralling and that they need this new impetus of funds in order to improve their purses. This, in turn, will reflect to the benefit of the Canadian breeding industry which, in recent years, has become a dominant factor in international racing.

Conversely, operators of some standard-bred tracks claim that off-track betting would mean their very extinction. They have argued that if people could place a bet without attending the track in person, it would have a disastrous effect on attendance. They claim that the "rural charm" of harness racing would be lost to thousands of Canadians.

● (2035)

Thus this Senate committee has also been requested by the Minister of Agriculture to examine the effectiveness of so-called "home marketing areas". This could prevent the siphoning off of bets from one area to another. The committee will have to examine the various systems already in operation around the world.

I am certainly not an expert on horse racing or horse betting—

Senator Flynn: Or on anything else.

Senator Perrault: The honourable leader on the other side speaks of expertise. I do not know how well his party is doing in the political horse races these days, but it seems to me they are fading in the stretch.

Senator Flynn: They are doing all right.

Senator Perrault: They appear to be bogged down on a muddy track right now.

Senator Marshall: Want to place a bet, off track?

Senator Perrault: I do not know if there are any experts in this chamber on the various systems, but there are authorities who claim that the methods adopted in New York are a disaster from every point of view, while others say the system in effect in our sister Commonwealth nation of Australia could be exported to Canada with fair and favourable effect.

In addition, the committee is being asked to consider the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented. One obvious question is whether the federal government, which presently takes a minuscule portion of horse racing revenues, should allow each province to decide for itself whether it wants off-track betting; in other words, whether this should be a purely provincial responsibility.

Finally, the committee is being asked to investigate the effects of off-track betting on society, and other related questions. There is no question that the drive for off-track betting has been accelerated because many segments of the industry believe that the lotteries have become convenient and richly-advertised competition for the gambling dollar. There is also the view, held by certain police chiefs, notably in metropolitan areas, that there is a considerable amount of illegal betting on horse racing at this time, and that legalized betting would take away money which presently fuels the activities of organized crime.

There will be over 20 horse races shown on national television this summer—more than ever. This will create more interest in racing, but it might be naive to think that every viewer will tune in just to see if the breed is improving. It could well be that many Canadians not present at Woodbine will welcome the opportunity to test their ability with cash to find the winner of the Queen's Plate and other such races.

All in all, honourable senators, this is a far-reaching and useful study that we have been asked to carry out. Our recommendations will be awaited with interest in many parts of Canada.

[Senator Perrault.]

I respectfully submit that the Senate will be performing a public service by undertaking such a study.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to ask a question of the Leader of the Government? Can he tell me why, especially since the opponents of off-track betting are mostly the people involved with small country fairs, he would direct this study to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Apparently betting is controlled, or regulated, by the Department of Agriculture. We have a good Agriculture Committee here in the Senate, and I can tell you that the people involved in these small fairs who are opposed to off-track betting will hesitate, especially in light of the conference of the first ministers of the country that concluded today, to come before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, whereas they would be very happy to make representations before the Agriculture Committee. This is something to which I think we should give consideration.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, arguments can be made on both sides of the question. The one thing I think we can all agree on is that the subject of off-track betting is primarily a legal matter. Senator Riley may be arguing the fact that off-track betting relates primarily to the question of horse breeding and the development and health of Canada's equine resources, but it seems to me that, on balance, the subject is clearly a matter for consideration by our Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I asked the Leader of the Government on an earlier occasion whether he would consider it appropriate to have this matter dealt with by a special committee of the Senate. I can understand his reluctance to suggest the setting up of a special committee for this purpose in view of the workload and the scheduling problems as far as Senate committees are concerned. I do, however, have some sympathy with the suggestion of Senator Riley that perhaps the Agriculture Committee is the more appropriate committee to consider the matter.

I am not against referring the question to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, but it can hardly be described as either a legal or a constitutional matter. To some extent, it is a moral issue.

Senator Walker: It is an immoral issue.

Senator Grosart: It would certainly have been much more of a moral issue before the Government of Canada itself got into the off-track betting business. Without in any way consulting the Canadian public, it was decided that the Government of Canada should go into the off-track gambling business. I regretted that decision at the time, and I still regret it.

This is not the time to discuss the pros and cons of off-track betting. We are dealing now with only the motion to refer the matter to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I am sure it is a question which will be thoroughly discussed and on which there will be many representations from varying viewpoints.

There is a tendency to think that this would refer just to horse races—harness racing, flat racing and steeplechasing. It is already obvious that this may well be the opening for off-track and on-track betting on dogs. I am sure that is a matter which will be raised before the committee.

I would hope that the committee, in considering and reporting upon this very important matter, will give thorough consideration to the conscience of the Canadian people. I hope that the committee, in addition to considering the economic aspects of off-track betting—the provision of yet another means of making money to certain elements of our society—will take into consideration the fact that off-track betting will add to the totality of the gambling opportunities open to the Canadian people.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, I think I should say a word on this question. I certainly did not invite the assignment. When it was mentioned to me, I suggested that perhaps Senator Argue's committee might more appropriately handle it, or that a special committee be established. Personally, I know nothing about racing. As a matter of fact, I have a great prejudice against gambling. For that reason, I would not preside over the hearings on this matter.

I was told that off-track betting is prohibited by the Criminal Code, and for that reason it was appropriate that the subject be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. What I then proposed to the committee—and, as I recall, the committee agreed with me—was that we set up a subcommittee to deal with this matter. Because of my personal views on the question of gambling, I will neither chair that subcommittee nor be a member of it.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to what has been said. Dealing first with the contention that this is a subject which should not be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, surely the fact that it concerns something which is now prohibited by the Criminal Code makes it a legal matter. In addition, because it is expected the committee will have to recommend whether off-track betting should be under federal or provincial jurisdiction, it becomes a constitutional matter. For those reasons alone, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is the appropriate committee to which the matter should be referred.

As we have been told by the chairman of that committee, there will be a subcommittee established. That subcommittee will be the fact-finding body. Once the facts have been gathered, the whole question will be referred to the main committee for decision.

While the chairman was right in saying that he will not preside over the fact-finding body, the recommendation of the whole committee will have to be made under his chairmanship. It is the whole committee which will have the final say in the matter.

To sum up, because there are legal and constitutional implications to this question, it is my view that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is the appropriate committee to consider the matter.

Senator Grosart: Would the deputy leader, as part of his general definition of this issue as a constitutional issue, say it is one which, under certain proposed legislation, might be the subject of a referendum?

Senator Langlois: I do not know whether my honourable friend has read the proposed legislation now under study by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, but this is not something which would be included in any referendum.

Senator Grosart: The bill has reference to anything that is of a constitutional nature.

Senator Langlois: I do not think my friend has read the bill. It is limited to matters dealing with the Constitution or involving amendments to the Constitution. The motion now before us simply requests that the committee make a recommendation to Parliament respecting off-track betting. One recommendation could very well be that off-track betting should not be allowed in Canada. In that event, there would be no question of any amendment to the Constitution.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I wish to refer to the remarks made by Senator Goldenberg. I think it is a pity that just because he is opposed to gambling he should refuse to chair the committee or be a member of it. There can be no question about it—those who are in favour of gambling will not impose upon themselves the same moral restrictions. As some honourable senators may remember when we discussed the Loto Canada bill, I thought it was disgraceful that the Government of Canada should raise substantial revenues from the sale of lottery tickets. Like Senator Goldenberg, I am strongly opposed to gambling. I think it leads people to believe that the way to get ahead in the world is to get something for nothing, and that you succeed by luck rather than by skill, hard work and energy. I feel we may very well need on this committee some people who have the strong moral feelings and inclination that Senator Goldenberg has confessed to this evening. I would hope that he would not strike himself off the committee.

Senator Walker: I should like to say that I am in favour of gambling, and I, for different reasons, should like to see Senator Goldenberg continue as chairman of the committee. It will broaden his horizons, and it will introduce him to some of the joys of life that he has obviously missed in the past. It would do my learned friend, a professor and president of a Nova Scotia university, good if he went to the track occasionally.

Knowing my friend, Senator Goldenberg, for over 55 years, I know that he is a broadminded man. He has often sat in judgment on things that he does not believe in and, while the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return and learn that in this twentieth century gambling is here to stay, and it is a very enjoyable pastime. I hope he will reconsider his position.

Senator Goldenberg: I appreciate Senator Walker's remarks and his interest in wanting to broaden my horizons, but if my horizons have not been broadened over the 55 years that we have known each other, they will not be broadened at this stage.

Senator Flynn: I merely want to add a footnote. We need not worry too much, because before the committee is able to report, the election race will be on.

Senator Langlois: And you won't bet on it.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I do not disagree with this motion, and I am tempted to agree with Senator Walker that there is an awful lot of enjoyment to be had in life and that sometimes you miss out on some of it, but that can be carried a bit too far. There are some pastimes that we should not want to legalize, and certainly we should not hold a committee inquiry into them. What disturbs me about this proposed inquiry is that we will be taking legalized gambling a step farther. We have already established a national lottery. Although it is well administered and its revenue is being used for useful purposes, for some time now I have been concerned that millions of taxpayers' dollars are being spent on advertising the lottery. I have no objection to people gambling. As a matter of fact, I have been known to have had an occasional fling myself. I am not really opposed to lotteries, but I am strongly opposed to this constant advertising which entices people to get out and win a million dollars. I think it is immoral; I think it is wrong; and I think it is destructive.

Off-track betting now comes up in the context of good breeding of horses. This is sheer nonsense. Off-track betting has nothing whatever to do with horse breeding. Small country fairs, country tracks and big tracks have a lot to do with the breeding of stock, but off-track betting doesn't.

I hope that when our committee studies this question it will do so on the basis of the value of this additional gambling facility to society and that it will not be fooled by any smokescreen about off-track betting being in the interests of creating a finer breed of horses for export. I would be interested to see statistics with respect to the export of horses from Canada. I am sure that it is not going to bring the dollar back to 85 cents. I hope that this matter will be dealt with as it should be—as a straight extension of gambling facilities in Canada.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I was most interested to hear the comments made by my friend Senator Molson, and by other senators with regard to off-track betting. Gambling is a concept that has been accepted in our society. In various ways we seem to be a bunch of gamblers in Canada. Even politicians are gamblers; we like to take chances. I feel that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is the best place to resolve this problem for all of Canada. I feel that we can do it without being biased one way or the other. I am not going to go into whether I am for or against off-track betting, but I would say that this committee could do a great job for the country as a whole in this matter.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I was not surprised at what Senator Goldenberg said, but here you have the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee who does not want to have anything to do with a subcommittee formed for the purposes of looking into off-track betting.

Again I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Why not refer it to the Agriculture Committee?

Senator Flynn: What does Senator Argue think about that?

● (2050)

Senator Asselin: That would not solve the problem. We will still have to make the study.

Senator Riley: But why throw it at this particular committee, when the chairman does not want to be involved in it because he is morally opposed to it.

If you know anything about pari-mutuel betting in Canada, you will know that it is controlled and regulated by the Department of Agriculture. Most of the small agricultural fairs in Canada have race tracks, and the people in those communities like to see their horses competing and to bet on them. For years the pari-mutuel arrangements have been controlled by the federal Department of Agriculture. Up until recently the RCMP regulated the pari-mutuel betting at those tracks.

It is my understanding that the only people who are completely opposed to off-track betting are the people who run the small agricultural fairs, and I don't blame them. However, I do not think the matter should be studied by a committee other than the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I would go along with Senator Grosart's suggestion that if it is not the Agriculture Committee then it should be an ad hoc committee or a special committee, which would enable us to make a proper study of the whole question and give everyone an opportunity to be heard.

I remind honourable senators that much of the success of these small rural fairs depends on the horse racing and the pari-mutuel betting that takes place. The people who run these fairs will want to come before our committee, but I am not so sure they will want to appear before a subcommittee of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. They might well feel intimidated in respect of going before that committee, but I am sure they will want to appear before another committee because they are aggressive and militant in their opposition to off-track betting.

Personally, I have no feeling one way or the other. In fact, I don't go to horse races, although I saw the one on the canal on Sunday. That was a magnificent sight.

Senator Asselin: It was a good race, I understand.

Senator Riley: It certainly was, yes.

To get back to the point, the question of off-track betting is not unimportant. Someone suggested that it should be handled by the provinces, but to me it is a foolish idea that anything that is distasteful to the central government should be transferred to the provinces. Certainly, the provinces tax pari-mutuel betting, but the federal government is also involved. In fact, the federal government handles the photography and the photo-finishes. The whole thing is completely regulated by the Department of Agriculture, and rightly so.

Someone compared pari-mutuel betting to the lotteries, suggesting that it preys on the poor. I certainly agree that the lotteries prey on the poor, but the people who go to the track to bet on the races are in a completely different situation. The people who go to the race track, if they are wise, bet $2 on a horse to show and they win perhaps ten cents. Those bettors are not looking for a million dollars. Sometimes they even split a $2 ticket, and each one gets five cents on the payoff. To put such a matter before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is, to my way of thinking, completely out of place.

Senator Asselin: Oh, come on!

Senator Riley: This matter should go before either the Agriculture Committee or a special committee established for the purpose.

Perhaps the off-track betting aspect should go before the Quebec Crime Commission. Millions of dollars across the country are involved in off-track betting and the government gets absolutely no benefit from it. That money is not taxed, despite the fact that the bookies are making a bundle from it and most of them are involved in organized crime.

The people who bet thousands of dollars at a time in off-track betting just do not want to go to the track. They haven't the time. They would rather pick up a telephone and call a bookie. Well, why not, so long as it is legal? They have legalized the bookies in Britain, and I have never heard any complaints about that, so why not here? As things stand now, more money goes into the hands of the bookies than into the pari-mutuels.

Senator Asselin: That is one thing that the people who have studied this want to put a stop to.

Senator Riley: The Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs wants to set up a special subcommittee to make this study because he does not want it to be conducted by the full committee. I say that we should refer the matter to the Agriculture Committee or a special committee established for the purpose, so that the people concerned will feel free to come before it, and will not be afraid that some kind of conference of ministers is arguing the question.

In conclusion, I say that to refer this matter to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee would be a terrible mistake. It should go to either a special committee or to the Committee on Agriculture.

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to say on this matter. First, I support the motion, and I do not consider it particularly important what committee considers the matter.

I should like to associate myself with the remarks of Senator Hicks in his appeal to the respected Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to reconsider his stand. We appreciate his feelings in this matter. All of us have strong views on matters of this kind. All of us have had occasion to sit on committees, to discuss matters we have found distasteful and to make recommendations. This is perhaps a time when the background, experience, expertise and, I am sure, the objectivity of the chairman of that committee would be very useful.

● (2100)

I agree with Senator Grosart that this is no time to be discussing the moral and philosophical aspect of gambling. However, I want to associate myself with Senator Molson in respect of one matter he raised, on which I have very strong feelings, and that is the advertising of gambling that has been engaged in for the last two or three years. In my view, that advertising appeals to the baser human motives—greed, the idea of getting something for nothing. From the very first time I saw those advertisements until the present I have felt that if you want to see real obscenity you have only to look at and listen to those advertisements. They are obscene, and whoever is responsible should be shamed into taking them off the air.

Senator Riley: I should like to ask the honourable senator a question. Does he believe in liquor advertising?

Senator Rowe: I do not think the question is relevant, although that thought was in my mind just now. I have very strong views about the whole question of tobacco, from start to finish, and I have certain views about alcohol. I have used tobacco, and I still use alcohol.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Rowe: I think we should keep in mind the lessons that we learned, or should have learned, from the experiment with prohibition. As I say, this is not the time to go into the philosophical and moral arguments on gambling, or, for that matter, any of the other things to which human nature may be prone. If I had to answer that question directly I would say that we have to try to live with liquor, one way or the other, but recognizing the fantastic amount of social harm it does I think we should ban liquor advertising, just as I think we should ban tobacco advertising. However, I do not think the question is relevant.

Senator Williams: Honourable senators, at times I find it very difficult to understand this society, and perhaps I never will. Gambling is as old as man, or as old as humanity. Among my people a gambler was always a bachelor; he never could qualify to get a mate because his future was so insecure. However, that is not the real point this evening.

Maybe I have spent a small fortune on the Irish Sweepstake, hoping some day I might win. I believe that hope is in every person—to win against the great odds that there are in buying a ticket. Today Canada is the greatest sweepstake country in the world, and the Canadian people are enjoying it.

I am sure that at some time in the future we will have off-track betting. I am not criticizing those who say it is wrong, and I am not criticizing any committee that does not want to deal with it. However, it is human nature. Gambling against the odds possibly enables you to enjoy life better.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I am a little surprised to see senators raise what I would consider minor objections to the motion now before us. Here we have a Crown minister, the Minister of Agriculture, asking us to look into what I think is an important question. Off-track betting which is going on illegally across Canada needs to be legalized urgently because it is known that many Canadians spend money left and right with bookies who have no conscience because they are not subject to legislation regulating their operations.

So we are being asked to investigate off-track betting. We are told that this does not come under the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I understood Senator Riley to say that it had to be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. Well, when you are talking about off-track betting, you are not talking about horse breeding. It is only a matter of deciding from a constitutional and legal point of view under the Criminal Code if the Criminal Code should be amended to allow off-track betting, whether it should be legalized. That is the question.

That is why this has to be considered by the committee dealing with legal and constitutional affairs because the discussion is going to be whether or not the Criminal Code should be amended. It will not be a matter of allowing horse breeding, or whether breeders should get a premium—that is within the field of agriculture. But the members of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will have to decide whether or not it is in the interest of the people of Canada to legalize off-track betting.

Some senators called on Senator Goldenberg to remain as chairman of that committee as from a moral point of view and in his conscience, he was opposed to that kind of betting or off-track betting or any form of gambling. I say to the senator that if it was really a matter of conscience in his case, he did not have to accept the chairmanship of that subcommittee, and that every committee, as all senators know, can form a subcommittee to carry out investigations. The chairman of that committee does not have to be chairman of a subcommittee. That does not mean either that those who would be sitting on the subcommittee will really be in favour of the investigation which we are being asked to do.

There will be on that committee people who will also be reluctant from a moral point of view and in their conscience to make that investigation but if they are asked to do so, they will.

Well, I believe the attitude of Senator Goldenberg is outspoken. It is loyal. It is honest. He does not say he could not make a judgment. He says he would prefer to have others investigate that matter. So I think there is no problem. I agree, and I will be voting in favour of the motion.

[English]

Senator Riley: May I direct a question to the honourable senator? Now that Senator Goldenberg has said morally he would feel a conflict of interest in dealing with this matter, what objection would he have to a special committee, with legal and agricultural people on it?

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Special committees have often been set up by the Senate. There was, for instance, the committee on poverty which was of national significance and which discussed important issues. But we are dealing now with a very special question. A committee is called upon to carry out a study. In my opinion, this committee need not set up a special committee. All it has to do is appoint a number of its members to sit on this subcommittee and prepare a report to be submitted to the Senate.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Perrault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this substantive motion.

Senator Goldenberg: If Senator Perrault will allow me one last word, I want to make it clear to Senator Riley that I am not abdicating as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Riley: Only on an ad hoc basis.

Senator Goldenberg: You have had your chance to speak, Senator Riley, and you will let me finish.

Senator Riley: No trouble.

Senator Goldenberg: The committee today began to hear witnesses on the subject matter of the referendum bill, which we are told is priority legislation. I am presiding over the meetings. The sessions will continue for some time. I am not abdicating.

I am doing what Senator Asselin explained so well. I am doing what the Rules of the Senate allow us to do.

Rule 77(4) says:

A select committee may appoint from among its members such subcommittees as it may deem desirable which shall report back to the committee. The rules applicable in the committee shall apply mutatis mutandis in the subcommittee.

The subcommittee that is being set up will report back to the full committee, and unless the members of the committee want to remove me from the chairmanship, I assure Senator Riley that I will be presiding at the time when the subcommittee reports back.

On motion of Senator Sparrow, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 8, at 2 p.m.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, 14th February 1979, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Does that mean that the Senate will be sitting next Wednesday?

Senator Langlois: Yes, indeed.

Senator Flynn: Do you think we will have something to do on Wednesday?

Senator Langlois: We will have enough.

Senator Flynn: Of course, there will be Senator McDonald's speech. I wouldn't want too many people to miss that highlight in the Senate's program.

Senator McDonald: Especially you.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 13, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, when we return next Tuesday evening, Senator Godfrey will move second reading of Bill S-11, relating to trademarks and unfair competition, and we shall continue with the other items on the order paper. At this stage I should inform honourable senators that there is a possibility that one or two new bills will be introduced in this place next week.

● (1410)

A number of meetings of committees are scheduled for next week. On Tuesday the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 2 p.m., and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will meet at 2.30 p.m. to consider the subject matter of Bill C-9, respecting Public Referendums in Canada on Questions relating to the Constitution of Canada.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act. That committee will also meet at 2.30 p.m. to consider the subject matter of Bill C-37, the income tax amendment bill.

On Thursday the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 9 a.m., and the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has scheduled a meeting for 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-15. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 o'clock, and I understand that the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline and the Special Committee on the Constitution will meet next week. However, the times and dates for those meetings have not been determined as yet.

Senator Roblin: May I ask the honourable senator the name of the two pieces of legislation he expects to be before the Senate next week?

Senator Langlois: It has not been the practice to identify a bill before its introduction in the Senate, and for that reason I regret that I cannot comply with my honourable friend's request.

Senator Roblin: Then that is a supererogation, I submit.
Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EAST COAST FISHERIES—CANADA-FRANCE AGREEMENT— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on February 1 Senator Marshall asked a question with respect to Canada-France boundary negotiations in respect of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

I can report that Canadian and French officials have held three rounds of negotiations since July 1978 to discuss a maritime boundary delimitation in the area of St. Pierre and Miquelon. The negotiations follow upon decisions of the Canadian and French governments to extend their respective jurisdictions to 200 miles and aim at a mutually acceptable solution. The latest round of negotiations occurred in Ottawa on January 8 and 9, 1979. The negotiations have taken place in a friendly atmosphere and will be continued in Paris at a date to be fixed at a later time. In the meantime, the two governments have agreed on interim fisheries arrangements for 1979 for the area off St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Senator Flynn: What are these interim arrangements? I suppose they divide it between Newfoundland and St. Pierre?

Senator Perrault: That detailed information can be made available and included in the proceedings. The maps, of course, and geographical descriptions are very complicated, but if the Leader of the Opposition desires that information we will see that he gets it.

Senator Flynn: I understand that there are not 400 miles between St. Pierre, Miquelon and Newfoundland. I suppose both countries will have to give up a certain area.

Senator Perrault: As in the case of negotiations, an agreement does not totally satisfy either side. Further information will be provided to the Leader of the Opposition.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

PATRIATION OF THE CONSTITUTION—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether or not the federal government has made up its mind as to what to do in response to the suggestions by at least one province, and perhaps more, that Parliament should go ahead and patriate the Constitution without amendment.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the suggestions advanced by the premiers at the recent constructive constitutional meetings of first ministers are being studied by the government, but no final determination has been made with respect to any action which will be taken unilaterally, or otherwise, by the federal government.

NATURAL RESOURCES REVENUE—QUESTION

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question for the leader. What was the federal government's stand in the constitutional meetings respecting natural resources revenue, and what, indeed, was offered to the provinces and what was expected in exchange for natural resources revenue and management of them?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, assuming it can be made available in time next week, I shall be pleased to present in the Senate a résumé concerning the Conference of First Ministers. That résumé will cover the points raised by Senator Olson. It is an important area of federal-provincial relations and one on which I do not wish to make random comments.

EQUALIZATION FORMULA—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government to provide the same kind of information with respect to the subject of equalization. That is a subject which came up at the conference with a view to entrenching it in the Constitution. Perhaps the leader could inform us as to whether a specific equalization formula was mentioned or whether it was simply a statement of the principle.

Senator Perrault: I should be glad to do so.

JURISDICTION OVER FAMILY LAW—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I might ask the Leader of the Government whether, in view of the reported agreement on transferring jurisdiction over family law—which, I presume, means at least over marriage and divorce—from the Parliament of Canada to the legislatures of the provinces, the government is contemplating placing before both houses an Address asking for the necessary amendment to the British North America Act.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a response to that question will be included in the general statement that I intend to make on the Conference of First Ministers. As I said earlier, I hope to be able to make that statement to the Senate next week.

SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBER

USE ON MAIL TO ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL OVERSEAS

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, I understand that the Leader of the Government was ready to answer my question respecting the use of social insurance numbers last week but decided not to do so because of my absence from the chamber. I am wondering if he has that answer at hand.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question was answered subsequently. The answer can be found at page 494 of the Debates of the Senate for Thursday, February 1.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION BILL, 1979REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED*On the Order:

Consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on the Bill S-6, intituled: "An Act to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act".—(Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester)).

Senator Langlois, on behalf of Senator Smith (Colchester), moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, the Transport and Communications Committee held some nine meetings on Bill S-6, during which some 20 witnesses were heard and many important briefs considered. As a result of those deliberations, the committee, in its report, proposes seven amendments to the bill.

To place those amendments in proper perspective, I should like to summarize, as briefly as possible, the objectives of Bill S-6. Its main purpose is to exempt from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act agreements and contracts between shippers and conference lines.

Perhaps at this point I should draw the attention of honourable senators to some of the definitions contained in clause 2 of the bill. For purposes of this legislation, the word "commission" means the Canadian Transport Commission. The Canadian Transport Commission will be the governmental agency responsible for the application of the legislation.

● (1420)

The words "ocean carrier" mean an owner, lessee or charterer of a vessel who is engaged in the business of the transportation of goods by water. The expression "patronage contract" means a contract between a shipper of goods and members of a shipping conference whereby in return for certain advantages the shipper agrees to offer to members of the conference for transportation by them all goods, all goods of certain classes or a fixed proportion of all goods or of all goods of certain classes shipped by water by that shipper to places served by members of that conference. A "shipping conference" is defined as an association of ocean carriers that has the purpose or effect of regulating rates, charges and conditions for the transportation by those carriers of goods by water. The word "tariff" means a tariff of rates and charges established by a shipping conference for the transportation of goods by vessel alone or by vessel and by any other means of transportation, and includes any rules or regulations that determine the calculation of such rates or charges or prescribe terms or conditions for the transportation of goods by vessel.

As I have already said, the administration of this act will come under the Canadian Transport Commission.

Clause 4 provides for the investigation, under section 23 of the National Transportation Act, of certain contracts, agreements or arrangements between shippers and conference lines and of any practice put into effect by any member of such conference line.

Clause 5 deals with the non-application of the Combines Investigation Act to such conference lines' contracts or arrangements with shippers. I would dispense with enumerating the various contracts, arrangements or agreements which are so dispensed from the application of the Combines Investigation Act and to what degree these exceptions apply in regard to such arrangements or agreements.

Clause 6 provides for limitations to this exemption from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, and I will mention a few of these limitations. Clause 6 provides:

Section 5 does not apply to any contract, agreement or arrangement described in that section if all or any of the ocean carriers that are parties to such contract, agreement or arrangement conspire, agree or arrange

(a) to use a vessel for the purpose of preventing or lessening, unduly, competition in the transportation of goods by an ocean carrier that is not a party to such contract, agreement or arrangement;

(b) to refuse to transport goods for a shipper because that shipper has used a vessel of an ocean carrier that is not a party to such contract, agreement or arrangement for the transportation of goods; or

(c) to prevent or limit the use by an ocean carrier in Canada or elsewhere of port or other facilities or services relating to the transportation of goods because that carrier is not a party to such contract, agreement or arrangement.

In a few words, these limitations are there to prevent any arrangements or agreements limiting competition. Then the exemption from the Combines Investigation Act provided under the preceding clause 5 would not apply.

Clause 7 deals with the filing of documents with the Canadian Transport Commission. These documents are listed in the bill, and it is a very long list. It deals with every contract or agreement that is mentioned under clause 5, and notice of change in the membership of conferences. It also covers copies of tariffs established between conferences and shippers; copies of standard form of patronage contracts, which I defined a moment ago; and finally copies of any revisions or alterations of such agreements or contracts between shippers and carriers.

Clause 8 then provides for the time for filing of documents. The original wording of subclause 8(a) provided for the documents referred to in clause 7 to be filed with the commission "not later than 60 days after the coming into force of this Act or the day on which the contract, agreement, arrangement, tariff or standard form of patronage contract becomes effective, whichever is the later." Under subclause 8(c) the committee brought in an amendment striking out lines 8 to 11 and substituting the following therefor:

(c) paragraph 7(1)(e) shall be filed with the Commission not later than thirty days after the day on which the revision or alteration comes into effect, but a written notification of such revision or alteration shall be given to the Commission not later than the day on which it comes into effect.

In other words, there is a change from 60 to 30 days and the notification of revisions or alterations of tariffs or agreements must be filed on the day they come into force. This amendment was found necessary because clause 9 provides that any documentation filed with the commission must be certified as being a true copy of the original. Effectively, that prevents sending a notification by telex on the day the revisions or alterations are made, and, therefore, this amendment is necessary to permit the notification to be made by telex or other similar electronic device on the same day as the revision or alteration comes into effect.

Clause 10 deals with the inspection of documents filed with the commission. Amendment No. 2 strikes out line 18 and substitutes the following:

filed pursuant to section 7 and every notification given to the Commission pursuant to paragraph 8(c) shall on applica-

There is also an amendment to the French version of this clause. Lines 22 and 23 are struck out and the following substituted therefor:

l'article 7.

This is simply a question of drafting and it involves no change whatever in the meaning of the original clause.

Clause 11 provides for the destruction of documents filed with the commission. After a period of five years the commission is allowed to destroy any documents that are no longer in effect.

With respect to the investigation of shipping conferences, clause 12 provides for an inquiry and report by the director. It gives to the Director of the Combines Investigation and Research Branch the authority, acting on his own initiative or on direction from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or at the request of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, to investigate any dealings or operations of shipping conferences. That is quite a broad power, but it is necessary in the circumstances.

Clause 13 reads as follows:

Members of a conference shall maintain an office or agency in that region of Canada where they operate and shall make available to the public during regular business hours for inspection, or for purchase at a reasonable price, copies of all documents in force that they have filed with the Commission pursuant to section 7.

This clause refers to documents filed with the Canadian Transport Commission.

● (1430)

There is an amendment proposed to clause 13, which is that line 24 be deleted and replaced by the following:

sion pursuant to section 7 and of all notifications in force that they have given to the Commission pursuant to paragraph 8(c).

Again we include here notification of revisions or alterations to the tariffs or arrangements between shippers and conference lines.

[Senator Langlois.]

I come now to clause 14, dealing with the publication of tariffs, which provides that:

Every member of a conference shall make available to the public, at all its principal offices or agencies in Canada during regular business hours, for inspection copies of all its current tariffs—

And other documentation relating to such agreements referred to above. There is an amendment to this clause, striking out line 30 and substituting the following:

mission pursuant to section 7 and of any notification of an alteration or revision of such tariffs given to the Commission pursuant to paragraph 8(c).

Here again we include among the documents filed with the commission revisions or alterations of tariffs or agreements.

Under clause 15, members of a shipping conference shall, in certain circumstances, meet with a shipper group and shall provide to the shipper group information sufficient for the satisfactory conduct of the meeting.

Clause 16 deals with the power of the Governor in Council to make regulations for:

—the production by members of a shipping conference, at such time or times and in such form and manner as are specified in the regulations, of such information of a type specified in the regulations.

This is for the information of the Commission. There is an amendment proposed to subclause (2) in the French text, which is merely a matter of improving the wording. The amendment is that lines 19 to 27 of the French text be struck out and replaced by the following:

Les renseignements, de nature confidentielle, qu'un membre d'une conférence produit, conformément aux règlements établis en vertu du paragraphe (1), sur ses opérations commerciales ne doivent pas être rendus publics d'une façon qui permettrait leur accès aux concurrents des personnes concernées par ces renseignements.

The purpose of this is to keep confidential such information on arrangements, agreements or tariffs between conference lines and a particular group of shippers which could be useful to competitors of the shipping conferences concerned.

Clause 18 provides for offence and punishment. To this clause there is an amendment proposed to the French text, which is to strike out line 34 and substitute the following:

amende maximale de cinq cents dollars pour chaque.

The only change there is the insertion of "maximale".

That concludes the seven amendments proposed to this bill. Before resuming my seat, I should like to draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that this bill is to come into force on April 1, 1979, and to have a maximum duration of five years.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, although this is not the committee stage of the bill, I wonder if I might ask a question of Senator Langlois with respect to clauses 13 and 14, which have to do with the filing of documents. Clause 13 indicates that all documents are to be filed in an office or agency in the region where the company operates, and clause 14 refers to filing the tariff in all its offices.

I wonder why it is found necessary to restrict the filing of all documents to one office and not to treat tariffs in the same way, or vice versa. The two clauses seem to deal with the same subject in different ways. Perhaps there is a good reason for that.

Senator Langlois: There is a very slight difference in the wording of the two clauses. Clause 13 deals with maintaining an office or agency in regions where conferences operate and provides that they:

—shall make available to the public during regular business hours for inspection, or for purchase at a reasonable price, copies of all documents in force that they have filed with the Commission pursuant to section 7—

While clause 14 provides that:

Every member of a conference shall make available to the public, at all its principal offices or agencies in Canada during regular business hours, for inspection copies of all its current tariffs filed with the Commission—

Also, the word “purchase” appears in one clause but not in the other. There is surely some difference between the two clauses.

Senator Roblin: I do not follow my honourable friend, because both clauses refer to the words “make available to the public.” There is no distinction between the public and other people in the shipping conference. In both clauses it simply says “the public.” So that explanation does not convince me.

Senator Langlois: Also the word “purchase” appears in one clause but not in the other. There is surely some difference between the two clauses.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Senator Lewis moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

OFF-TRACK BETTING

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STUDY BY LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 6, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the feasibility of implementing a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada and any matter relating thereto, and, in particular,

(a) the economic effect such a system would have on the horse racing industry and on the distribution of industry revenues, particularly the revenues from pari-mutuel betting;

(b) the concept, structure and effectiveness of a so-called “home marketing area” for each track, with particular reference to equitability and enforceability;

(c) the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented; and

(d) the effect of such a system on society, its potential as a marketing tool of the industry and whether it would result in a reduction of illegal betting; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, it is not my intention today to discuss the merits, for or against, of off-track betting. My purpose is to discuss whether such a study by the Senate is indeed justified at this time, and, in the light of certain things which I believe to be facts, my opinion is that a study is not justified.

In recent years every possible representation on off-track betting, both pro and con, has been made to the Government of Canada through former Ministers of Agriculture, including the late Senator Greene, and Senator Hays and Senator Olson. Each, in his own time, looked at this question of off-track betting—

Senator Flynn: And did a stable job.

Senator Sparrow: —and reached the decision that no action should be taken.

• (1440)

There was, as mentioned by the Leader of the Government in his speech on Tuesday last, an effort made in 1972 to legalize off-track betting. Senator Olson, who was the minister at that time, introduced a bill, but it never saw the light of day as legislation.

The difference between then and now is that the ministers in those days were prepared to make the decision as to whether they would recommend to the government that there be legalized gambling in this country. The minister today, with the same information and some up-dated information, assured the racing people that he would make a decision on this issue by January of this year. He has, for whatever reasons, not followed through with that promise. Instead he has taken the delaying step of asking the Senate to investigate the matter.

The government leader stated on Tuesday, February 6:

I think it is to the credit of the Senate that the Minister of Agriculture—who at times in the past has made certain uncomplimentary remarks about the Senate, but who now obviously recognizes its value—

I really wonder what “value” he sees in the Senate at this late date.

From previous experience with the time these studies require, we all know it is impossible for such a study to be completed between now and the next election. If and when there is another election, there might well be a different Minister of Agriculture—

Senator Flynn: If?

Senator Sparrow: —and he may want to make his own decision at that time. I believe there is much doubt as to the value of a study at this time. If there is doubt in our minds then before this motion is voted on the minister should be asked to appear before the Senate, in this chamber, to present the reasons why he believes it is important at this time that the Senate make this study. I say that because once the committee is authorized to make the study we will have committed ourselves to the costs—the costs of personnel and other costs—all of which will be lost when this Parliament is dissolved for an election.

Therefore, honourable senators, in amendment, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook:

That the motion be not now adopted but that the Minister of Agriculture be asked to appear before the Senate, meeting in this chamber in Committee of the Whole, to explain to all senators

- (a) the need for a study on off-track betting,
- (b) what information, if any, he or his department is lacking in order to decide whether it would be feasible to implement a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada, and
- (c) the urgency at this time for such a study.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the feasibility of implementing a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada and any matter relating thereto, and, in particular,

- (a) the economic effect such a system would have on the horse racing industry and on the distribution of industry revenues, particularly the revenues from pari-mutuel betting;
- (b) the concept, structure and effectiveness of a so-called "home marketing area" for each track, with particular reference to equitability and enforceability;
- (c) the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented; and
- (d) the effect of such a system on society, its potential as a marketing tool of the industry and whether it would result in a reduction of illegal betting; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook:

That the motion be not now adopted but that the Minister of Agriculture be asked to appear before the Senate, meeting in this chamber in Committee of the Whole, to explain to all senators

- (a) the need for a study on off-track betting,
- (b) what information, if any, he or his department is lacking in order to decide whether it would be feasible to implement a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada, and

- (c) the urgency at this time for such a study.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in speaking to this interesting amendment advanced by Senator Sparrow let me provide some very brief background to the proposal to have the Senate study the subject of off-track betting.

First of all, there is a substantial division of public opinion on the subject. Some provinces are for legalizing off-track betting; other provinces are substantially against it. Even communities are divided on this particular issue.

No one suggests that the question is a life-or-death issue. No one is suggesting this is one of the great fundamental issues facing Canadians at this time.

Senator Roblin: That's why we get it.

Senator Perrault: But the issue is one which should be resolved after these many years. It has been suggested that successive Ministers of Agriculture have endeavoured to bring forward legislation to clarify the situation and to legalize off-track betting. It is precisely because of these great divisions in the country that this proposed legislation has never been enacted into law. That is precisely the reason why the Senate, because of its expertise and resources, has been asked to study the question, to present once and for all to the government—

Senator Flynn: Once and for all?

Senator Perrault: —a suggested course of action and direction.

Any committee activity undertaken by the Senate is not lost nor wasted, in any circumstances, regardless of what may happen. Whether an election is called or not, the Senate is always in a position to re-establish its committees whatever government may come to power. I say this despite the fact that, as a supporter of the government, I believe the present rather stable political position will remain for some time to come.

Senator Flynn: As bad as it is.

Senator Perrault: But whatever the future brings, there would be no wasted effort on the part of any Senate committee on this particular subject. It is not as though the Senate will vanish overnight and somehow there will be a new group of senators back in the fall. There is a continuity here.

Senator Flynn: But, I fear, the "fall" will come eventually.

Senator Perrault: It would be quite possible for the committee to extend an invitation to the Minister of Agriculture to appear before it during its deliberations to suggest some of the concerns he holds on this particular subject. I would expect the committee or the subcommittee studying this problem would wish to do that.

When the Minister of Agriculture made his announcement on January 23, he said, in part:

● (1450)

I have discussed referring to a Senate committee the subject of legalization of off-track betting on horse races in Canada. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has indicated that he is prepared to have a resolution introduced in the Senate calling for a study of off-track betting.

This course has been followed. Mr. Whelan added:

The legalization of off-track betting poses serious questions for the general public as well as the Canadian horse racing industry.

Of course it does. That is why there is such a great difference of opinion. Certain provinces do not agree with certain other provinces on the subject, and there are conflicting views within the regions themselves.

The other day, the minister confirmed that conflicting views exist within the horse racing industry on the question of off-track betting. He said:

At this time I cannot introduce off-track betting legislation. The issue requires further study. All concerns should be thoroughly aired at a public forum, and a Senate committee could provide an opportunity to do this.

This is the kind of invitation to assist a public policy development that I think most senators would welcome—that is, the opportunity to provide some sensible direction on a matter which has troubled many governments and individuals across the country.

Terms of reference for this proposed committee have not been hastily or facetiously drawn. If honourable senators will review the terms of reference they will see that they are very complete. I hardly think that any facet of the problem has been omitted. Madam Speaker read the terms of reference a few moments ago, but here are some of them:

(a) the economic effect such a system would have on the horse racing industry and on the distribution of industry revenues, particularly the revenues from pari-mutuel betting;

That is a matter of some importance, I would think, to provincial governments, as well as the federal government.

(b) the concept, structure and effectiveness of a so-called "home marketing area", for each track, with particular reference to equitability and enforceability;

This is an invitation to the committee, if its members are prepared ultimately to suggest that off-track betting be legalized, to state how they think it can be introduced while assuring equitability and freedom from illegality.

(c) the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented;

That is, the effect of such a system on society. Some honourable senators have stated that they consider there is too much gambling in the country now, and they are very concerned about the proliferation of lottery and gambling schemes. The Senate will have the opportunity to call upon Canadians concerned with this aspect of the problem to appear at meetings of that committee, with the press present, and before all honourable senators if they desire to attend.

Two or three days ago Senator Riley said that he thought there was a danger of opponents of the legalization of off-track betting being intimidated by a committee. I hardly fear that that is a real danger. For many years I think that interests on both sides in this question have demonstrated a great aptitude for setting forth their views. They have demonstrated no lack of willingness to speak out and to provide testimony. There has never been a reluctance on their part to come forward.

What has been lacking, surely, however, is this: there has never been a public forum where both sides and all interests have had an opportunity to meet in the presence of the media and before members of Parliament to set forth their views and their opinions. A Senate committee hearing would mark the first time that an opportunity has been accorded to committee members, as well as to other senators who may not be members of the committee, to listen to and cross-examine witnesses. That is the basic difference between what has transpired in the past 10 to 15 years and what is proposed in this particular resolution.

I believe that there is no question at all but that the Senate committee could serve a very useful public service by undertaking this assignment. Generally, the proposal has been warmly welcomed from coast to coast in this country at a time when the Senate is attracting more favourable attention than at any time in recent years. Many of its studies, such as those of foreign affairs, national finance, banking, agriculture, legal and constitutional affairs, retirement age policies, and childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour, have attracted, deservedly, a good deal of public respect and acclaim. The Senate is attracting very favourable attention these days.

Senator Grosart: We will send ourselves some roses.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, it may perhaps be a good idea to send the Senate some roses from time to time. Perhaps one of our main problems is that some honourable senators themselves are too willing to underestimate the accomplishments and capabilities of this chamber. I want to tell you that at the recent constitutional conference it was very interesting to hear the favourable comments directed to the Senate by several of the representatives.

Senator Grosart: It is St. Valentine's Day next week.

Senator Perrault: Well, senator, I hope you will send out your usual complement of cards.

I will not pursue this further, honourable senators, but this is, I repeat, an opportunity for the Senate to demonstrate its research capacity and its fair-minded attitude towards questions of public interest.

I do not think any real value would be served in calling before us, in Committee of the Whole, the Minister of Agriculture to ask for an explanation of why he wants the subject studied by the Senate. It seems to me that the reasons are already apparent and well publicized. If honourable senators would like to hear from the Minister of Agriculture, however, may I suggest the possibility that the members of the committee will call him to testify.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if the Leader of the Government is aware of the fact that it would not be necessary for the Senate to be in Committee of the Whole to carry out the suggestion of Senator Sparrow. I am not necessarily supporting that suggestion, but I am sure he is aware that we would not have to go into Committee of the Whole to hear the minister.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I know that this matter of off-track betting has been a controversial subject for a long time, and, as Senator Sparrow pointed out, I, as Minister of Agriculture for nearly five years, was in the centre of that controversy, in that I was urged to make a decision on it.

It was not very difficult to add up the arguments on one side and the other as they applied to what is normally considered to be a function of the Department of Agriculture, but there are more far-reaching implications for society involved in off-track betting, or, if you want to use the more common expression, bookmaking, than simply that.

I suggest there are two areas, at least, in terms of reference (c) and (d) that have not been studied properly. Indeed, I know of no forum that has been suggested to date where this study could take place. As a matter of fact, my experience with this subject is that, as between those on one side of the argument and those on the other side, the lines were drawn pretty strictly along which system was going to get the revenue. The local agricultural societies, for example, have an interest in this, because in some cases much of the revenue they use to organize and continue their agricultural shows comes from their share of the money generated by betting. They are wondering whether they could attract the same crowds, and whether they would be able to obtain the revenue they are getting now, if all bets did not have to be made on site.

On the other side, of course, the horse breeder associations believe they might be able to increase their revenue from the gambling industry, if I can call it that, simply because it is assumed that there would be a far greater amount of money wagered if it could go through the off-track route. I do not dispute that at all. We should realize that the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented has not been studied—at least, not to my knowledge.

● (1500)

I know—and perhaps I should not say this, but I will, in any event—that I did not particularly like the idea of the Department of Agriculture having to carry out the functions of a police force, but there were reasons for that. As far as the regulation of pari-mutuel betting is concerned, there were aspects that needed to be policed on the site, but, as I said, that did not seem to be a proper function for the Department of Agriculture. In my opinion, that function should have been carried out by the Solicitor General's Department, the ministry in charge of the RCMP in this country. As a matter of fact, we did not even try to hire police officers. The Department of Agriculture paid the cost of the RCMP officers involved in regulating this industry, and recovered that cost by taking a portion of the money wagered. As I recall, the department took one-half of one per cent of the total, and most of that was transferred to the Solicitor General's Department in payment for the services rendered by the RCMP.

Paragraph (d) of the proposed terms of reference of the committee reads:

the effect of such a system on society, its potential as a marketing tool of the industry and whether it would result in a reduction of illegal betting;

That is a matter on which there have been a number of opinions expressed. A subcommittee of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee would apply some judgment after it has heard not only from the two sides involved now, but from other people who may wish to express views on this subject, and who, up to this time, have not had that opportunity. I am sure there have been opinions expressed by people in different sectors of society, but not in a formal manner.

I think we have to take into account one other thing. If this committee is simply going to hear evidence and come to some kind of decision on what would be the best manner of distributing the revenue, that is one thing, but the committee would engage in a different type of investigation if it tries to establish the principles involved.

Whether we are going to have off-track betting—or legalized bookmaking, because that is what it really is—for horse racing only is another point to consider. It could be asked why off-track betting could not cover other kinds of sports, such as football games and hockey games. I can see no difference at all if you are simply talking about the betting and bookmaking aspect of it. If you bring in the other aspect of it—that is, the view that the revenue would promote better quality horse breeding, or financially support local agricultural fairs where some of the races would take place—that is a different situation. I hope that this committee investigates the whole subject and takes account particularly of paragraphs (c) and (d). The Minister of Agriculture can provide the committee with arguments that were advanced in years gone by. I am sure those files are available. However, I am afraid that they are confined to the two sides of the question, and come from those who have a vested interest in the revenue generated by pari-mutuel betting.

Senator Asselin: Stay with the merit of the motion.

Senator Olson: I am sure the Minister of Agriculture is willing to appear before the committee as the first witness, or one of the first witnesses, and lay before the committee all the evidence that has been accumulating in his office.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have listened with deep interest to the arguments of Senator Sparrow, Senator Perrault and Senator Olson, a former Minister of Agriculture. With all due respect to Senator Sparrow, I think the effect of his amendment would be to scuttle the efforts that are currently being contemplated by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I cannot see, for the life of me, what the Minister of Agriculture could produce in respect of the arguments, pro or con, concerning the terms of reference in the motion before us. I cannot see what contribution he could make, but I can clearly see what can be done by a subcommittee of a standing Senate committee.

The Senate has gained the reputation over the past several years of making not only thorough studies of legislation, but detailed studies of many problems that this country and other countries face. It seems to me that we can perform an extremely beneficial function for Canada and we should not be deprived, by way of amendment, of that privilege, prerogative or, indeed, obligation.

I must disagree with Senator Olson on one minor point. Of course, other sports such as football, hockey, baseball, and so on will be considered. Perhaps that is a good idea, but the point is that we have not been asked to do that by anyone. We have been asked by the Minister of Agriculture to study specifically the economic aspects and social aspects of off-track betting.

I should like to give an illustration of the interest this has created in the country. During lunch today I received a call from a radio reporter in Regina, Saskatchewan. As you know, I am from New Brunswick, so I was surprised to receive a call from a radio reporter in Regina. This illustrates the deep interest there is in this matter. The reporter wanted to know my views on this subject and I told him, of course, that it would be premature for me to give him my views because we are only considering setting up a committee to study it. I told him that if I gave him my views now it would be something like a judge giving his verdict before hearing the evidence.

I would like to hear those interruptions, if I may.

Senator Flynn: I said that the comparison you made to a judge considering his judgment might be going a little far.

Senator Robichaud: I told him that we will submit a report, and it would be premature if I were to give him my views before we have heard any evidence. I think any lawyer would agree that that sounds logical.

Senator Steuart: Don't give a judgment.

● (1510)

Senator Robichaud: As much as I would like to sympathize with the views expressed by Senator Sparrow, I cannot possibly support his motion in amendment. I feel strongly that, once more, the Senate is being given an opportunity to serve the people of Canada. We should not miss this opportunity. This study can be carried out whether or not there is an election. The committee can sit in all parts of Canada and even in the United States, so as to benefit from the experience of our American friends, and perhaps elsewhere. It has to be a full study. If the committee carries out its terms of reference, the Senate will once again render a great service to the people of Canada.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I do not rise at this time to oppose the motion in amendment but to bring to the attention of the Chair a question which has arisen in my mind with respect to it.

The motion in amendment requests that the Minister of Agriculture be invited to appear before a Committee of the Whole of the Senate to state his reasons for wanting this matter referred to a Senate committee for study.

I should like to draw the attention of the Chair to rule 18, which is as follows:

When a bill or other matter relating to any subject administered by a department of the Government of Canada is being considered by the Senate or in Committee of the Whole, a minister, not being a member of the Senate, may on invitation from the Senate enter the Senate chamber and, subject to the rules, orders, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate, may take part in the debate.

This is not a matter which comes under any department of government. The main motion simply requests that the subject of off-track betting be studied by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee of the Senate. Off-track betting is illegal in Canada under the Criminal Code. It is not something that comes under a specific department, and for that reason I do not see how the motion in amendment can be entertained at this time.

I am not asking for an immediate ruling on this point. I merely draw the matter to the attention of the Chair for later ruling.

Senator Asselin: Are you saying that the motion in amendment is out of order?

Senator Langlois: It may be out of order. I wish to be enlightened by the Chair with respect to the matter I have just raised. A ruling by the Chair at a later date on this matter would be of benefit to all honourable senators. I merely raise the matter for a ruling; I am not raising it at this point to oppose the motion in amendment that is before us.

Senator Grosart: Is the deputy leader really suggesting that the Criminal Code, which covers this whole subject matter, is not something that is administered by a department of the Government of Canada? Of course it is.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the point of order raised by Senator Langlois, and because I wish to read both the main motion and the motion in amendment again, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to the Honourable Senator Bell.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I am delighted to be able to take part in this debate—a debate that has been so ably conducted from the time of the presentation of the First Report of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution on October 19, 1978.

The committee held 36 sittings between the end of July and mid-October, a great many of which were held during the summer recess. The committee very modestly does not mention this, but certainly it was at great sacrifice to both the members and their families.

Why would the committee take on such an onerous job at that time of the year? The reason, of course, was the time constraints which surrounded Bill C-60. The government, when it introduced the bill on June 20, 1978, stated that the target date for enactment was July 1, 1979.

As we all know, relatively simple, straightforward bills can take quite some time to move through Parliament, not to mention such measures as the combines investigation legislation which has had many reincarnations. Even the four-page Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Bill was subjected to scrutiny over a longer period than that proposed for the Constitutional Amendment Bill. In most cases it takes many weeks and months, and, in some cases, years, before a bill finally passes this chamber. In a way, it is much like Parkinson's Law—the time expended discussing a problem increases in inverse ratio to its importance. So, a hearty vote of thanks to the committee.

Although it was subsequently learned that the bill would not be re-introduced in its original form, the committee's opinion that the proposals are "far-reaching and novel", and "deserve serious and unhurried study" before we are confronted with the reincarnation, makes sense. Because the Constitution—discussion of or changes to—is not a topic which keeps the average man on the street, whoever he is, awake at nights, this House of Parliament, this Senate, has the most solemn obligation to scrutinize any proposed change to the Constitution.

The report itself points out that the British North America Act has served Canadians well, has been enormously flexible, and that drastic changes should not be made in haste. Doubts regarding the legality of the proposed changes as they affect the monarchy and the Senate were raised in terms of whether such changes could be made by the federal Parliament alone. As a result of those doubts, a reference was made to the Supreme Court of Canada relating to the power of the federal Parliament to unilaterally change the Senate. Regardless of how the Supreme Court rules on that reference, little will be solved. As the committee pointed out—and very temperately—the provinces should give their agreement. The fundamental component of the Constitution, the monarchy, was not referred to the Supreme Court.

[Senator Flynn.]

The committee comments that although the government paper A Time for Action suggests that the language of the BNA Act is obscure and the style "plodding and uninspiring", Bill C-60 was little improvement. By way of example, how can one have confidence in a Constitution that starts with the words "... the people of Canada declare ..." They have done no such thing, and that is a foreign way of commencing a Constitution. Then it continues:

—the desire of its original component provinces to be united together—

The wording of the British North America Act is:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by Proclamation that—

And the various provinces are named.

—shall form and be One Dominion under the Name of Canada—

Is that plodding and uninspiring? There is quite a difference, I think.

Proposals regarding the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the monarchy, the second chamber, regional disparities and the Supreme Court were the subject of objective assessment by the committee, and I sincerely believe that the government is required to respond to the questions raised by the committee on those various subjects.

I will confine my observations to the proposed changes affecting the monarchy because the monarchy is our most misunderstood institution. Considering the spirit of confederation and unity, all systems of law, government and social order derive their authority from our constitutional monarchy.

This week at the federal-provincial constitutional conference, the premiers made it very clear that they want no change regarding the monarchy. While this is reassuring, we in this chamber have no cause for complacency. The question of the sovereign's powers has been raised and the Senate cannot respond by passive observation.

I am in agreement with respect to the recommendations and the conclusion of the committee that "constitutional conventions, customs and usages ... would not be affected or rendered enforceable by the court" unless this was specifically provided. I feel this is very important. The committee describes the provisions in clause 51 dealing with the constitution of the cabinet as "obscure"; in my opinion this is a most temperate adjective.

At this point I should like to quote from the House of Commons Hansard:

—we tend to meet any new situation by reorganizing, and a wonderful method it can be for creating the illusion of progress while producing confusion.

That is a quotation from a speech made by the Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, on February 27, 1969, when he was quoting Petronium Arbiter from 2,000 years ago. I do not want to do the Prime Minister an injustice by taking this quotation out of context. As you will remember, in 1969 he was doing a lot of reorganizing. He wanted to indicate that this was not for the purpose of creating confusion. Nevertheless, this is quite an appropriate quotation in relation to Bill C-60.

Clause 53, and especially paragraph 53(2)(b) deals with a Prime Minister who has lost the confidence of the House of Commons and who advises the Crown or its representative as to whether he should be invited to form a new government. The committee points out, in no uncertain terms, that this is unacceptable.

The committee very neatly deals with clause 30 which refers to the Queen as the "sovereign head" instead of the "sovereign".

Clause 43 deals with the executive government. The view of the committee is that the executive government should be vested in the Queen, and the Queen should be retained as part of Parliament, and if that is so there is no need for subclause 48(2) which purports to preserve the powers of the sovereign while in Canada. One could add, while agreeing with the committee that subclause 48(2) is extraneous, that it is intolerably presumptuous.

I also agree with the committee that no reason is given for changing the name of the Privy Council.

The committee warns that any attempt to put conventions, customs and usages into a text of law should be approached with the utmost caution, and that warning should be heeded. As long as they are left uncoded, the political process, the House of Commons and the electorate can decide what a custom, usage or convention is. That concludes the points in the report with which I am in agreement.

Speaking directly to Bill C-60, I am in disagreement with subclause 45(1) which states that the Governor General should hold office for a definite term. I also disagree that the sovereign's powers of withholding assent and reserving bills should be removed—that is, section 55 of the BNA Act—that clause 47 which vests command-in-chief in the Governor General is unnecessary; and I am not convinced that there should be explicit provision for the cabinet—that is, making the cabinet a legal entity which is covered in clauses 51, 52, 53 and 54. My basis for disagreement with the committee stems from the terms, both stated and implied, in Bill C-60 that the executive—that is the Prime Minister and the cabinet—somehow hold the power which they exercise. Michael Valpy put it very well when he wrote in the Vancouver Sun:

The Canadian constitutional monarchy is a purely Canadian institution. It has evolved in a strikingly different way from the constitutional monarchies of other Commonwealth states, it is indigenous—it is ours.

The Crown in Canada separates the possession of power from the wielding of power. The monarchy possesses the power without wielding it, and the government wields it without possessing it. Any constitutional change that puts power into the hands of the executive to keep, hold, retain, possess as well as manage, exercise and use, leads inevitably to tyranny.

I should like to give you my definition of "head of state". It is "one recognized as the personnal embodiment of the nation, impartial between various local groups, aloof from detail and controversy, counselling government and able to make effective intervention in the event of necessity." With the sovereign as head of state, effective intervention is possible in the event of necessity.

The Prime Minister is literally the Queen's first minister, and his cabinet is literally her Privy Council. Therefore, where is the need to recognize the cabinet in law? She trusts the judgment of the people who have elected him. She accepts his advice as long as Parliament has confidence in him. When Parliament, representing her people, no longer has confidence in him, she sets in motion the process which removes him—perhaps to be given the chance to try again; perhaps not. Any usurpation of power, in law, by the Crown's ministers would be a serious blow to our Parliament and to our democracy.

The Governor General, as the sovereign's representative to whom she delegates most of her duties, must be unquestionably answerable to her alone. She must be able to remove him, with or without her first minister's advice. That is why I disagree with subclause 45(1).

A particularly important safeguard is the power to withhold assent, or to reserve bills, which the committee seems to think obsolete. One has only to think of an unconstitutional bill passing a docile and supine Parliament to realize the importance of the royal prerogative of section 55 of the BNA Act.

For a similar reason, command-in-chief of the armed forces should be vested in the Queen. Obviously the Queen or her agent, the Governor General, is not going to ring up the Princess Pats and issue orders, but the safeguard is there, and until Parliament has sanctioned the committing of the armed forces, the Queen will not assent.

These royal prerogatives are our "constitutional fire extinguishers." They may never be needed, but it is surely the part of wisdom to see that they are there and in working order. The other royal prerogatives are regularly employed—the right to dissolve Parliament; the right to order a general election; and, much more infrequently, the right to dismiss a government. This latter is perhaps in the "fire extinguisher" category. I do not know how many senators play chess, but this rather reminds me of a game of chess where the king does not have very many moves, but if you remove him it is game over.

These are some of the problems that have been raised; objections that perhaps we should consider because they need answering. If the constitutional monarchy is our least understood institution, it is partly because we have a woefully misinformed public and totally uninformed students. A responsible and diligent press and seriously dedicated departments of education could help rectify this situation.

Some other questions are raised that I would like to put to you briefly. Does being born outside Canada make one any less Canadian? Would an elected head of state be more impartial?

The Queen represents the people in a deeper sense—the abiding continuity of the nation beyond the mutations and vicissitudes of parties. The Prime Minister speaks for the government, but the sovereign for the people.

Why should not the Governor General assume the royal prerogatives in his own right as was suggested in Bill C-60? From whence will be derived his power? From the government which appointed him? Would his only powers be those which the government allowed him? How long would he retain those powers if he felt compelled to use the royal prerogatives? Bill C-60 would require the Governor General to do the bidding of the council of state. I should like to see our Constitution used in a far less restrictive, unimaginative and reactionary way than that suggested by Bill C-60, which would try to cement Canada into this government's modus operandi.

There are quite a few examples of things that enrage many of the people in Canada, although they would never come before Parliament. For example, the removal of the Queen's portrait from the citizenship courts; no more 21-gun salutes on her birthday; no taking part in the Silver Jubilee celebrations on a national scale. There are various things that Parliament does not have an opportunity to know about, but when it came to removing the word "royal" from the name "Royal Canadian Mounted Police," that caused such a terrible uproar that the name was left untouched. Such attempts are small, mean, and unworthy of our country, but they are erosions that are taking place. I think the Scots have a good term for it: Many a mickle makes a muckle. In other words, things that are small in themselves eventually add up. Surely that is not what Parliament has signified for the people of this country.

I should like to see the Queen and the Governor General given a real opportunity to shine for Canada. Give the Queen a short list of suitable names from which to choose her representative in Canada. The Queen has the less obvious right to encourage, to be consulted, and to warn. Give her the opportunity. We are in an age of modern technology. I cannot see the problem there, because all kinds of new opportunities would open up if that right were taken advantage of.

As the fount of honour, the Queen and/or the Governor General should be given some latitude. They have no latitude now. The Governor General has the right to summon senators and fill vacancies without taking the Prime Minister's advice. In fact, he can even appoint the Speaker of the Senate. Why not encourage the Governor General to take a more active part in the sort of appointment-making he is entitled to do?

[Senator Bell.]

The two most distinctive features of Canada on this continent are the Queen and the French Canadian culture. The symbols are exemplified in the Canadian Coat of Arms. Let us use them with pride. As the monarchy is a unifying force for Canada because it is above and beyond partisan politics, so it is an external unifying force for the Commonwealth. Let us show some leadership and initiative in Commonwealth development. It has great potential. To make sure of this we could have a Commonwealth exchange, and some future governments might think it desirable to have an exchange of Governors General, or to have some other form of that type of development and not keep it simply on an economic and social level.

We really do not know what the future holds so let us not preclude what we want to do in the future by a restrictive, reactionary Constitution.

So long as a spirit of goodwill, trust and co-operation exists any system will work. Our system will work. It is our own, home-grown, constantly evolving system. Without goodwill, trust and co-operation no system will work; not even our own.

I should like to end with a quotation from one of my favourite books, Ottawa Editor by Charles A. Bowman. At page 272 he has this to say:

The Peace Tower's design is in right perpendicular lines, in testimony to Canada's faith in the Great Architect of the Universe. The windows of the Memorial Chamber look to the east, west and south. . .

Words of timeless significance had to be found for the architectural adornment of the flat stonework in the window arches. So came the architect's call to me to make my offering.

I tried to find passages in Shakespeare, Milton, Ruskin, Epictetus. . . The realization came to me that I must go to the supreme source: the Volume of the Sacred Law furnished the texts.

I found the right words in the Psalms. Over the main door, facing south, the text is from Psalm 72, verse 1: "Give the King thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness to the King's Son."

In this memorable quest, I asked the brothers to whom I had constantly looked for guidance, Wilson and Harry Southam, to help me. They gave me the words from Proverbs, appropriately for the west window: "Where there is no vision the people perish."

For the east window, we agreed on the text also from Psalm 72: "He shall have dominion from sea to sea."

Words of affirmation, carved to endure through the ages, they call for no interpretation. They are direct and simple.

The words over the main entrance, understood in modern terms of Parliament, equally apply. The King is synonymous with the sovereign people. As the Canadian people's representatives enter Parliament, members and senators, the prayer for judgment and guidance is surely in accord with the will of the nation.

So it must continue to be through the years . . . as the stones of the Peace Tower weather in the white mantle of winter, and the promise of spring is in the maple bud.

On motion of Senator Robichaud, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 13, at 8 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Senator Forsey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, tabled the following report:

Tuesday, February 13, 1979

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its Fourth Report as follows:

(Statutory Instruments No. 5)

1. In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-71-72, c. 38, your committee has determined to draw to the special attention of both Houses and in doing so to record its concern over the absence of legal rules governing the operation of import quotas on footwear and other goods.

SOR/77-1058, Import Control List, amendment; and

2. By SOR/77-1058, Import Control List, amendment, import controls were placed on the following items of footwear:

"Men's and Boys', Women's and Girls', Children's and Infants' footwear other than rubber, canvas or water-proof plastic footwear and other than downhill ski boots, whether fully or partially manufactured."

The effect of placing these items on the Import Control List pursuant to section 5 of the Export and Import Permits Act is that importation is forbidden except under permits. Permits are of two kinds. First, under section 8 of the Act, the Minister may issue an individual permit to any resident of Canada permitting him to import controlled goods in such quantity, of such quality, from such places or persons and subject to such other terms and conditions as the Minister specifies in the permit or as are laid down in regulations made by the Governor in Council. Secondly, under section 12(c) of the Act, the Governor in Council may make regulations in effect setting up a general permit system. Under such regulations—(1) General Import Permit No. 57 was issued on 1st December 1977 as SOR/77-1059 allowing anyone to import several very limited categories—(2) of controlled footwear.

3. For general commercial purposes, an importer must rely on an individual permit under section 8 of the Act, which reads:

"8. The Minister may issue to any resident of Canada applying therefor a permit to import goods included in an import Control List, in such quantity and of such quality, by such persons, from such places or persons and subject to such other terms and conditions as are described in the permit or in the regulations."

The regulations referred to are now the Import Permit Regulations, SOR/79-5, previously the Import Permit Regulations, 1954. These regulations are themselves quite brief and their substance is simply that the granting of a permit lies in the Minister's discretion. Obviously behind such a simple front there lies a complex administrative machinery which, in the case of controlled footwear, evidently entails a system of changeable quotas for importers. Your Committee's enquiries indicate that the review of quotas is carried out from year to year by a Footwear Quota Review Committee which operates vis-à-vis the footwear importing and retailing industry by a system of "Notices to Importers", the current numbers of which were supplied to the Committee on request by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The allocation and size of quotas is obviously considered to be a matter of policy.

4. To the extent that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Quota Review Committee have rules which are applied in the allocation and the setting of the size of quotas, no ascertainable instruments or legal rules would seem to be involved. Matters of policy are left to the government by the Act and an administrative machinery has been set up by it outside the Regulations to execute the policy decided upon within the context of the power to control imports.

5. Your Committee considers that the Houses should be aware of the absence of any regular machinery established by any legal rules embodied in any statutory instrument governing the granting and review of import quotas. The Export and Import Permits Act has, since at least the 1971 amendments to it, been regularly used as an instrument of economic regulation in very sensitive areas of the economy, although it seems originally to have been drafted and passed to deal with much more limited matters. If indeed import controls have become a feature of Canadian economic management, your Committee is concerned that there is not a set of rules more elaborate than that set out in a short statute and a skeletal set of Regulations that will enable importers and retailers of goods to know what they face and can enforce and what procedure they must follow and can expect to be followed.

6. Your Committee also reports that neither SOR/77-1058, Import Control List, amendment, nor SOR/77-1059, General Import Permit No. 57, infringe in any substantive way any of your Committee's criteria for the scrutiny of statutory instruments. However, SOR/77-

1058, Import Control List, amendment, does fail to recite any paragraph of either subsection of section 5 of the Export and Import Permits Act as the basis for the action taken in adding footwear, as specified, to the Import Control List. Reliance on section 6 of the Act is recited but section 6 merely empowers the Governor in Council to revoke, amend, vary or re-establish any Import Control List. The grounds on which any item may be placed on the Import Control List are set out in section 5 of the Act, and your Committee is of the view that the ground relied upon should be referred to in every case where an item is added to the Import Control List.

—1 Section 8, Import Permit Regulations 1954, C. 55, 1225. These regulations, having been made long before 1972, do not fall within your Committee's terms of reference. New Regulations have been made and registered as SOR/79-5, but do not differ in any material way from the Regulations under which General Import Permit No. 57 was issued.

—2 These categories appear in the Annex to this Report.

ANNEX

GENERAL IMPORT PERMIT NO. 57

1. Any person may, under the authority of this General Import Permit, import into Canada from any country, except Rhodesia, footwear as described in item 57 of the Import Control List

(a) where the imported footwear is acquired or received by a resident of Canada for his personal use or as a gift and each importation of the footwear does not exceed six pairs;

(b) where the imported footwear are bona fide commercial samples not for sale in Canada, imported into Canada by manufacturers, retailers and designers, and each importation of the footwear does not exceed two hundred pairs;

(c) where the imported footwear is acquired or received by a resident of Canada by virtue of a medical prescription;

(d) where the imported footwear is sisal footwear, oriental type sandals or disposable paper slippers;

(e) where the goods are imported by and for performing arts organizations;

(f) where the imported footwear was awaiting customs clearance on December 1, 1977 or was in transit on that day if the importer submits to the collector of customs at the port of entry of the goods, bills of lading or other documentary evidence acceptable to the collector of customs to substantiate that the goods were awaiting customs clearance on December 1, 1977 or were in transit on that day; or

(g) where the imported footwear does not exceed one thousand pairs per shipment during the period commencing on December 1, 1978.

Respectfully submitted,

Eugene A. Forsey,
Joint Chairman.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

THE ROYAL WILLIAM—REMOVAL OF COMMEMORATIVE PLAQUE—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I seem to be popping up all the time tonight. I have two questions to ask of the Leader of the Government, one of them entirely non-controversial and the other perhaps not quite so much so. In each case I shall be obliged to lay a certain groundwork very briefly for the question.

The first question has to do with a Canadian first which has rather dropped out of the public mind and which I think ought to be recalled. Formerly in the passage leading to the Library of Parliament there was on the wall a bronze tablet commemorating the Royal William, which, as honourable senators will doubtless recall, was the first ship to cross the Atlantic wholly under steam—a ship built in Three Rivers and engined in Montreal and sailing with fuel from the Pictou county coal mines.

For some reason which I have never understood that plaque was taken down to make room for something else evidently considered more worthy. I made some inquiries about it and found out that it was stored away somewhere. I have forgotten now where. But now that the powers that be have decided to put up something on the wall outside the passageway—namely, the rather ill-identified plaque commemorating the Westminster Palace Hotel Conference of 1866—I am wondering whether we should not take steps, or try to get the authorities to take steps, to put up that commemoration of the voyage of the Royal William again. I think it is highly desirable that this should be done, and I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he might look into the matter and perhaps use his vast influence, the weight of his enormous prestige and authority, to persuade the authorities of the two houses, or the government, or whoever is concerned, to replace that plaque.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall use my best influences to have the situation regarding the steam packet commemorative plaque investigated. Hopefully, the plaque can be regilded and buffed and returned to a place of honour somewhere within these precincts. However, I can provide no guarantees.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENT TO PUBLISH LABOUR GAZETTE— QUESTION

Senator Forsey: I have a further question of the Leader of the Government. Honourable senators will notice that we now have in our desks Bill C-30, to amend the Department of Labour Act. Section 4 of the present act says, among other things, that the department shall “issue at least once in every month a publication to be known as the Labour Gazette”.

The last number of the Labour Gazette, which I looked at in the Parliamentary Library today, is labelled “Final Issue, November-December, 1978—numéro final, novembre-décembre, 1978.”

Bill C-30, which would relieve the Department of Labour of that statutory obligation, was introduced on December 15 last in the other place. It contains a clause saying that it shall come into force on January 1, 1979. The bill, as far as I know, has not yet even passed the other place. I have heard nothing about its being a priority item. I am wondering now—and this is the point of my question of the leader—under what authority the Labour Gazette, whose publication every month is a statutory obligation of the Department of Labour, has been brought to an untimely end.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Forsey, as usual, has asked pertinent and challenging questions. The Labour Gazette was an excellent and historical journal. I understand that one of its early editors was the late William Lyon Mackenzie King. I can provide no immediate and detailed reply to the honourable senator's question. The question will be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EAST COAST FISHERIES—CANADA-FRANCE AGREEMENT— QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Can he inform the house whether any discussions were held between the Prime Minister of Canada and Premier Barre of France, during the latter's visit to Canada, over the position of the two countries with regard to St. Pierre and Miquelon, and particularly with regard to the establishment of boundaries between those islands and the Province of Newfoundland-Labrador with regard to fishing rights, and also with regard to the establishment of the 200-mile limit, the boundaries surrounding, and the median line which has to be discussed as it reflects the views of both countries on this very sensitive issue?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, further information was sought on this particular question last week. Some information was available at that time, and I committed myself to endeavour to provide a more complete reply to the question. I have received no specific information that that was on the agenda of talks between the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and Premier Barre of France. However, inquiries will go forward.

● (2010)

INTERNATIONAL SOCIAL SECURITY AGREEMENT—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government if it is the intention of the government to seek the formal approval of the Senate and the House of Commons before ratification of the so-called international social security agreement signed on February 9 of this year by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of France, Mr. Olivier Stirn.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no information immediately available. The question will be taken as notice.

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEAL HUNT PROTEST ACTIVITIES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked on January 30 by Senator Marshall in relation to seal hunt protest activities. The senator asked about the activities of one Cleveland Amory who has apparently been active in organizing a seal hunt protest.

First, no licence or permit has been issued to a vessel known as the Sea Shepherd to observe the seal hunt. Secondly, application for such a permit has not been received to date from either Paul Watson or Cleveland Amory, two of the reported principals. Thirdly, an application for a permit to allow a vessel, reinforced for ice, at the hunt has been received from Julian Hopkins, Executive Director of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Mr. Hopkins' application did not contain any details and he has been requested by telex to supply same. Fourthly, departmental officials are attempting to ascertain if the vessel referred to in Mr. Hopkins' application is in fact the Sea Shepherd.

PERMIT APPLICATIONS—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: As a supplementary question, since the seal hunt protest activity has been increasing over the past weeks, and since we are now fast approaching the opening of the seal hunt, which is around March 12, could the Leader of the Government furnish this chamber with an up-to-date report of all applications for permits? Would he also determine the position of the government with regard to the number of nincompoops who are trying to interfere with the reasonable livelihood of the fishermen of Newfoundland, and report to the chamber on both of these matters as soon as possible?

Senator Perrault: Up-to-date information will be sought.

GRAIN

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS—QUESTION

Senator Argue: Could the Leader of the Government bring the Senate up to date on the general policy of the government regarding the purchase of an increased number of hopper cars for the movement of grain?

As background information and supplementary to the question, the Wheat Board announced that it would like to see the federal government, in conjunction with the three prairie governments, purchase 10,000 hopper cars. The Wheat Board itself is now committed to the purchase of 2,000 hopper cars. The Saskatchewan government has said that it would like to see a ministerial task force set up to discuss this whole question.

Since the transportation of grain, particularly for the export market, is a federal responsibility, can the leader assure the house that the government is showing leadership with respect to the purchase of hopper cars? It would seem to me—and I regret to have to say this—that the government today is reacting to proposals from others rather than taking what I think is a very necessary and desirable lead in this matter. It took the lead in the past when it purchased 8,000 box cars, but it seems to be at a standstill now.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware, of course, that the government has shown outstanding initiative in this area in past years. The Honourable Otto Lang has been responsible for the ordering of grain cars and other necessary railway equipment to transport Canada's goods to our seaports for shipment abroad.

I will seek further information from the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, the Honourable Otto Lang, the Minister of Transport, and attempt to bring that to the Senate as soon as possible. There is, as honourable senators are aware, controversy about the degree of need for these cars.

Senator Argue: I should like to assure the leader that my question is based on the need to strengthen the good works and stand of the Honourable Otto Lang in the cabinet, as I perceive his stand to have been. I think it goes without saying that those of us from the prairies should express ourselves on this subject in order that that may be accomplished.

● (2015)

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Having originally come from one of the prairie provinces, I am very interested in this problem. I have heard about the Crowsnest rates, and I have always listened with great interest to speeches on the marketing of grain. I would refer particularly to a recent speech on this subject by Senator Roblin.

Whom are we relieving, the farmers or the railways? What are the responsibilities upon the railways under the Railway Act? The railways have never shown greater profits than they have this year, and it is an historical fact that when the railways move large quantities of grain they show heavy profits; but they are always complaining about the Crowsnest rates. I, too, would like an answer to this question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall have to take that question as notice. I shall endeavour to obtain a general statement of government policy and present it here as soon as possible.

SPORTS

DEFEAT OF NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE ALL-STAR TEAM IN INTERNATIONAL COMPETITION—QUESTION

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government after the humiliating defeat of the NHL All-Star Team by the Soviets last weekend. Does he not think that it is time for the government to establish a commission of inquiry to look into the structure of the National Hockey League as regards professional players in order to consider their contracts, their training methods, and their salary scale, which, I think, is much too high?

Senator Marchand: Too low.

Senator Asselin: Too low, if you compare it with the salaries of honourable senators. Yes, Senator Marchand is right. Would it not be also time for the government to give more support to amateur sport which, in my view, could spend judiciously the millions of dollars which are now being made available to professional clubs to expand their arenas and enable them to draw even higher salaries. Is it not time for the government to look into that matter by establishing a commission of inquiry? It would enable us to avoid in the future being ridiculed as we were last weekend by the Soviet hockey team that came to New York to defeat a team of professionals who were supposed to demonstrate to the world the supremacy of North American professional hockey?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, together with, I suspect, most honourable senators, I too suffered during the events in New York last Sunday evening—

Senator Flynn: I didn't.

Senator Perrault:—which saw the defeat of the National Hockey League All-Star Team. However, surely we should keep this defeat in reasonable perspective. It was not and is not the end of the world; it was not and is not a national humiliation. It happened to be a tough hockey series which was lost by a team largely made up of Canadian players.

If, for example, the second game had been five to four for Canada, the demand for an inquiry would not be made in this chamber this evening, because then Canada would have won the series two games to one. But the result of the second game was five to four for the Soviet Union. And so we have this national introspection.

When some Canadians agonize over the events of last weekend, they should remind themselves that Canada in the past 10 years—and this redounds to the credit of individuals principally but also to various levels of government and the political parties represented in those governments—has made immense strides in international competition. For example, Canada today stands in the top three or four nations of the world in swimming. We are doing extremely well in gymnastics and in track and field. Canadian skiers from western and eastern Canada make up one of the best downhill teams in the world today. I think that all of us can take great satisfaction from the achievements of these and other Canadian athletes. We can take the same kind of pride in our figure skaters and our curlers. We can talk just as favourably about the achievements of Canadians in many other sports endeavours as well.

● (2020)

Senator Asselin: Talk about Canadian hockey.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Perrault: In recent days Nancy Garapick has brought new honours to this country in a swimming meet in Europe.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: These achievements in sports are a tribute to Canada's athletes and the determination and dedication of Canadians from all provinces. As far as hockey is concerned, there will be other series to be played in this country and abroad, and Canada will win more than its share of the games.

Senator Hicks: May I be immodest enough to point out that Nancy Garapick's coach is a member of the Department of Physical Education at Dalhousie University.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED MOVE OF CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION— QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I apologize for asking another question, but I am going to ask it anyway. Could the Leader of the Government advise the chamber now, or after consultation with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, on the position of the government following the request by the Canadian Legion that serious consideration be given to leaving the Canadian Pension Commission in Ottawa, and not moving that commission in the impending decentralization of DVA headquarters to Prince Edward Island—I am not taking away anything from the move to Prince Edward Island—so as to ensure no disruption of service to the veterans of Canada? It is important that the Canadian Pension Commission remain in Ottawa, where it is centrally located.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a number of representations have been received by many senators and other members of Parliament over recent days on this subject. The matter is being taken up with the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and I hope a reply will be forthcoming soon.

SHIPPING CONFERENCE EXEMPTION BILL, 1979

THIRD READING

Senator Lewis moved the third reading of Bill S-6, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, even though we are on third reading of this bill, with your permission I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to elaborate further on two answers I gave to my honourable friend Senator Roblin on February 8, when we were considering the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Senator Roblin's questions dealt with clauses 13 and 14 of Bill S-6. I should like to add that clause 13 has two purposes. First, it requires members of a conference to establish an office or agency in the region of Canada in which they operate. This is considered desirable because, at the present time, many conferences do not maintain conference offices or agencies in this country.

Secondly, clause 13 requires conferences to make available to the public, for inspection or purchase, copies of documents filed with the commission and still in force. This is considered desirable because, under the current legislation, relevant conference documents, including conference agreements, membership lists, standard patronage contracts and tariffs are accessible to the public only in the offices of the Canadian Transport Commission in Ottawa, and not in the region in which the conference operates.

Clause 13 also ensures that conferences serving this country have a physical presence in the region of the country in which they operate and that they maintain, at that office or agency, copies of relevant documents for inspection or purchase by the public.

On the other hand, clause 14 simply ensures that copies of current tariffs are available for inspection at whatever principal offices or agencies in Canada the various members of a conference might have, as distinct from the conference offices or agencies. This is considered desirable, as the current legislation requires only that conferences file such tariffs with the Canadian Transport Commission. This will allow the shipping public in particular to have easier access to the rates and conditions governing the shipment of goods covered by the various tariffs.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I thank my honourable friend for taking the trouble to investigate this matter further, but I would like to ask him a question in respect to his answer.

Why is it considered desirable to file the tariffs in all the offices in the country, but not these other documents which, in turn, form the material on which the tariffs are based? It seems to me that it would be desirable, if you are going to require these tariffs to be filed in all of the offices, to extend the regulation to include the other documents, which, as I say, are relevant to the tariffs themselves.

Senator Langlois: There is a distinction to be made between the functions of the two types of office concerned.

First, as I said, clause 13 requires to be made available to the public, for inspection or purchase, copies of documents filed with the commission and in force. On the other hand, clause 14 simply ensures that copies of current tariffs are available for inspection at principal offices maintained in Canada by various members.

In one case we are dealing with offices maintained by a conference, and in the other with offices maintained by members of these conferences. I hope my friend can see the distinction between the two. We are dealing with two aspects of the publication of these very important shipping documents.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

TRADEMARK BILL, 1979

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey moved the second reading of Bill S-11, relating to trademarks and unfair competition.

He said: Honourable senators, trademark legislation is one of the oldest forms of legislation in Canada. The Parliament of Canada passed the first federal legislation in respect of trademarks in 1868 and, at recurring intervals since that time, the act has been revised to reflect the changing conditions and practices of the Canadian marketplace. The most recent significant revision of the act occurred in 1954. The most important changes introduced in 1954 by the present Trade Marks Act were:

● (2030)

(1) Provision for the use of a registered trademark by persons other than the owner under a scheme where the owner of a registered mark can obtain the right to permit others to use the trademark if application is made to, and accepted by, the Registrar of Trade Marks to record such other persons as registered users.

(2) Provision for the sale or assignment of a trademark without a simultaneous transfer of the whole business in respect of which the trademark had been used.

In 1971, the Trade Marks Act had been subjected to a thorough examination by the Economic Council of Canada in its report on Intellectual and Industrial Property.

This started the process of serious consideration being given to once again revising the Trade Marks Act. After careful consideration of the various commentaries that have been received by the government in response to the Economic Council's report, the government, in 1974, issued a working paper on the revision of the Trade Marks Act and invited comments thereon. Those comments, together with extensive consultation with the private sector and with the relevant government departments, have culminated in Bill S-11, which is before us tonight. Thus the whole process of producing this bill has taken eight years, so that it can hardly be taken as an emergency piece of legislation, and this has some relevance to remarks that I will make at the end of this speech as to how the bill should be dealt with in the Senate.

Trademarks are an essential component of any effective competitive economy. It is by a trademark that a seller of goods competes for the trade of the consumer, and the purchaser can distinguish between the competing products of the same kind.

We are all familiar with the value of trademarks. For example, in the drug trade there has been agitation to have doctors prescribe drugs by their generic names rather than their trade names so that the customer can buy cheaper drugs from a less well-known maker, thus creating more price competition. The purpose of the trademark legislation is to provide a means to regulate the use of the trademark owner's exclusive right to use and to protect the consumer against deception.

The authority to pass laws in Canada in respect to trademarks falls within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada under section 91(2) of the British North America Act, which is "the Regulation of Trade and Commerce." This authority has recently been confirmed once again by the Supreme Court of Canada.

If I were to characterize the general nature of the proposals contained in this bill, I would say that their essential thrust is to place a greater reliance on the marketplace and the natural forces that work therein to regulate the use of trademarks. The government believes that by placing greater reliance on the marketplace several benefits will ensue.

Secondly, the bill will, in large measure, reduce the possibility of consumer deception. The consumer will be provided with a greater assurance that the product he is buying is in fact what it purports to be. Under the present act, all that is required is that the licensing agreement must provide for, in effect, quality control over the goods or services covered by the agreement. It does not matter whether the owner of the trademark enforces the quality control provided for in the agreement.

Under the bill, if it is found by a court that the owner either does not have control over the use of the trademark or does not exercise such control, the registration of the trademark can be declared invalid. The owner of the trademark, therefore, has a practical incentive to enforce any provisions of the licensing agreement providing for control of the quality of the goods or services covered by the agreement.

Finally, it is anticipated, if all the proposals are enacted into law, that there will be possibilities for effecting substantial savings in the administration of the Trade Marks Branch.

It is not my proposal to review in great detail on a clause-by-clause basis the proposed act; indeed, that will come later at the committee stage. Rather, I would like to call your attention to several basic and important highlights or features of the bill as it stands before you. As I have previously pointed out, the act of 1954, for the first time, permitted the licensing of trademarks. That is, the owner of a trademark may license someone else to use the trademark in association with the goods or services provided that there is a provision in the licensing agreement that they meet certain conditions as to quality and other features.

● (2035)

The act as it now stands requires that the licensing agreements be registered with the Registrar of Trade Marks and that the registrar examine them to make sure that the agreement contains the necessary controls to assure the quality to be maintained. Experience has indicated that the registrar lacks the resources and the expertise to adequately examine agreements to determine the efficacy of these controls.

Furthermore, the registrar is not required to see that the controls are actually exercised. If the controls are not adequate and the trademark is debased by the licensee it is really the trademark owner who suffers the consequences, even if his mark is not invalidated.

It was the recommendation of the Economic Council, in part, but more particularly of the working paper, that the responsibility to ascertain that the controls for licensees are adequate, should rest with the licensor. If the controls are not adequate, or if he does not exercise the controls, he may lose his mark. Accordingly, the bill proposes that the registrar no longer approve the licensee agreements but only record full particulars of licence agreements.

I understand that this is somewhat similar to the system now used in the United States. I have also been informed that there has been some criticism of the way it has worked in the United States. I would suggest that this is an area that should be looked into in committee as we may well be able to benefit by the United States experience.

Recent court cases found that the use of a trademark by a licensee entered as a registered user rendered the trademark invalid unless the name of the owner of the trademark appeared with the name of the registered user. The reasons given by the judge in this case extended to their logical conclusion could make the use of a trademark by the registered user on goods other than goods manufactured by the owner a reason for causing the trademark to be declared invalid, thus negating to a large extent the purpose of the registered user provisions in the 1954 act. This case, the OFF case, led the government to believe that the definition of "trademark" and the definition of "distinctive" need to be amended to fully implement the aforementioned licensing proposals.

Moreover, in another case the court by some very complicated reasoning held the use of a trademark as a part of a trade name of a registered user could cause the trademark to be declared invalid.

These two cases appear to be instances where fine legal reasoning should have been tempered with a modicum of common sense. Since it is common practice for Canadian subsidiaries of foreign companies to use the house mark of the parent company as part of its corporate name, the licensing provisions will be amended to permit this in certain specified circumstances.

The present act prohibits the use of trademarks in fair and accurate comparative advertising, and in an effort to stimulate the competition and improve consumer awareness as to the quality of various products it is now proposed that trademarks can be used in comparative advertising if they are used in a fair and accurate manner.

The elimination of the examination of registered user agreements will effect some savings within the Trade Marks Branch. The Trade Marks Branch has experienced a substantial increase in the number of applications for trademarks. In the past five years the demand for trademarks has more than doubled on an annual basis. In order to be able to handle this increased flow of demand for trademarks it will be necessary to institute a series of internal systems for handling the substantial flows of paper. Therefore, at several instances in the act it is proposed that changes be made to permit the registrar, for example, to store the register not just in written form but also in computer data banks. This will permit the branch to capitalize on the latest techniques in office management. Related to this matter, for the first time the Trademark Act will specifically authorize the Trademark Registrar to publish the Trademark Journal and to maintain a register of trademark agents.

All industrial property legislation around the world has been undergoing substantial revision. In an effort to standardize trademark registration around the world and to permit economies of operation between various offices, a treaty has been proposed called the Trademark Registration Treaty. In that treaty the term of a trademark is defined to be 10 years subject to renewal. At the present time, the Canadian Trade Marks Act grants the exclusive use for a period of 15 years subject to renewal for additional 15-year periods. It is proposed in this bill that the term be reduced to 10 years to bring it in line with the proposed Trademark Registration Treaty and with emerging European practice.

While it is not contemplated at this time that Canada will necessarily ratify the Trademark Registration Treaty, it was felt by the government that it would be worthwhile to make the necessary change in the term of the Trademark Act so that if at a future date it was decided to ratify the Trademark Registration Treaty it would not require substantial amendment to the then existing act.

Under the Trade Marks Act of 1954 the owner of the trademark had exclusive right to use the trademark and it was the opinion of the Economic Council that the owner's right to the exclusive use could act as a tariff barrier. A subsidiary in Canada may, in fact, be given by its foreign parent the right to own the trademark in Canada, and this subsidiary could use it to exclude the lower priced equivalent product from coming into Canada from his foreign parent.

Perhaps the most famous instance of this is the Mepps Fishing Lure case in which fishing lures manufactured in France were sold in Canada at a substantially higher premium over the equivalent lure in France. The trademark owner went to court to enjoin Canadian importers from bringing in the equivalent lure manufactured by the foreign parent and selling it at a lower price. The court, on appeal, found in favour of the importers, arguing that this power of exclusion was a perversion of the Trade Marks Act.

It is proposed in this bill that that kind of abuse to the Trade Marks Act will be eliminated. Thus, goods bought abroad from a parent company, or a company that is directly related to or controlled by the Canadian owner of the trademark, and bearing the same trademark, may be brought into the country provided it is not demonstrated that there are substantial differences between the foreign and domestic product. It is not anticipated that a substantial amount of goods will flow into the country, but what is anticipated is that price differences which cannot be accounted for by the difference in transportation costs, tariffs and exchange rates, will not exist for a substantial period of time in Canada. It is the feeling of the government that if a local distributor or manufacturer needs protection, it is the Tariff Act and not the Trade Marks Act that should afford such protection.

There is one final provision that deals with the protection that will be afforded appellations of origin under the new Trademark Act. Canada has an obligation under the Paris Convention to afford protection to appellations of origin. In the past, certain bilateral treaties afforded protection to certain appellations of origin in Canada that was in excess of the protection that was afforded under the Trade Marks Act to trademark owners, and was in excess of that required under the Paris Convention. The best known instance of how this works is in respect of the word "champagne." Champagne is a geographical district in France, and the Supreme Court of Canada held that it was protected by the Canada-France Trade Agreement Act and, therefore, could not be used in Canada by a Canadian company in association with a sparkling white wine produced in Canada. Canada has recently abrogated this trade agreement with France.

Under the bill, an appellation of origin is treated, in essence, as a type of trademark and subject to the same market forces and regimes as other kinds of trademarks. Thus, if the owner of a trademark allows others to use the mark without his consent, he faces the possible loss and, indeed, invalidation of his trademark.

It is proposed in the bill that appellations of origin will be treated under clauses referring to certification marks, and that in considering an application for registration of an appellation of origin the registrar should bring to bear the same conditions that apply for trademarks—that is, what the appellation of origin means in the Canadian marketplace and not in some foreign marketplace. In most instances, the appellation of origin will be indicative of a class or type of goods from a given place of origin, and having a certain quality. However, in other cases it may simply be distinctive of a type or quality, and not distinctive of the origin of the goods. In such instances, it will be possible to have separate but equivalent standards apply to the particular product but in the case of goods that originate in Canada, their origin will be clearly distinctive. In this way the consumer will be assured of standards of quality, but will also be protected from deception as to place of origin.

If the owner of a registered appellation of origin under these provisions does not choose to enforce the exclusivity of the use of the term, he risks the possible invalidation of his appellation. In other words, if the person or group who has registered the appellation does not take steps to protect it—if they feel it has insufficient market value toward its continued protection—the mark can risk being made available to all manufacturers.

What does all this mean in practical terms. Let's take one example. Because the word "champagne" was used by Canadian producers of sparkling white wine for more than five years without French interests making an effort by legal process to stop its use, the French interests cannot register the word as an appellation of origin. The Canadian wine producers on their part must not deceive the public into thinking that their product was produced in France, and must clearly indicate that it was produced in Canada. When so-called Canadian champagne was first produced, the labels on the bottles certainly did not indicate clearly that it was produced in Canada. For some years now each bottle is clearly labelled as "Canadian" champagne so that the public is not deceived in any way. This practice will have to be continued under this bill if they are not to lose their right to use the word "champagne."

From what I have said it should be obvious that the proposed revisions to the Trade Marks Act, if enacted into law, will serve to provide Canada with a new act that meets the particular needs of Canada and yet is consistent with international practice.

Honourable senators, there is one other matter I would like to draw to your attention. Clauses 8(2), 36(e), 58 and 59(1) are set out in italics because they are incidental monetary clauses. The House of Commons has always taken the position that such clauses appropriate part of the public revenue and are contrary to section 53 of the BNA Act and, therefore, cannot be included in a bill which is first introduced in the Senate. The fourth edition of Bourinot at page 493 explains that in such cases the money clauses are embodied in the bill as presented in the Senate in italics in order to make it more intelligible. When the bill is considered in committee, these clauses are ordered to be omitted. For convenience, these clauses are still printed in italics in the engrossed bill sent to the House of Commons but are technically not part of the bill and are considered blanks in the bill.

In the House of Commons, the bill is referred to a committee which will then propose amendments reinserting these clauses in the bill. These amendments will be adopted by the House of Commons, and then the bill will come back to the Senate for approval in final form.

The last time this procedure was adopted was, I believe, in respect to the Bankruptcy Act. The procedure was explained by Senator Hayden in his speech on April 4, 1978, and reported at page 517 of Senate Hansard of the last session. It is rather an ingenious way of being able to introduce a bill in the Senate even though it contains a few clauses which could be considered money clauses.

I mentioned in my opening remarks that I would make some suggestions at the end of this speech as to how this bill should be dealt with in the Senate. Honourable senators will recall that I moved the second reading of the bill providing for amendments to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the Foreign Insurance Companies Act. These were complicated and very technical provisions. I recall the bill received first reading in the Senate on Tuesday, February 22, 1977. I started to review the bill on the Wednesday morning and spent a good part of the Thursday morning with Mr. Humphrys, the Superintendent of Insurance. I was starting to have lunch with him in the Parliamentary Restaurant when he told me that I was to move second reading of the bill in the Senate that afternoon. I remember nearly falling off my chair as I had not been paying as much attention as I should when it was moved that second reading take place on Thursday, and I had presumed that it would be the Thursday a week later. I remember gulping down my soup, abandoning the rest of my meal and rushing back to my office to try to get my speech in shape for that afternoon.

The bill received second reading on March 8 and was referred to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee which held a hearing on it only two days later and reported it with ten amendments. The bill received third reading in the Senate on March 16, 1977.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Was that bill introduced in the Senate?

Senator Godfrey: Yes, it was introduced in the Senate.

The bill then went to the House of Commons. It was considered by the committee there on June 21, 1977, and reported with 24 amendments. Just before the bill was considered in the Commons committee, one of the large firms of investment dealers in Toronto asked their lawyers to look at the provisions of the bill. They discovered that there was an error in drafting which would in many cases have prevented insurance companies from purchasing bond issues. This was drawn to Mr. Humphrys' attention, who drafted and submitted to the Commons committee amendments to cure these defects. If the bill had been passed by the House of Commons in the form in which it left the Senate, it would have had very serious adverse effects on the financing of companies in Canada, and everybody would have had egg on their faces.

Why do I mention this at this time? Simply to point out that, with respect to complicated, technical legislation, bills should not be considered in committee until the public, and particularly interested parties, have had a reasonable length of time in which to consider them so that they can make a meaningful input when they reach the committee stage.

With respect to the amendments to the Insurance Companies Act, the Canadian Life Insurance Association certainly had considered the bill before it was discussed in committee, and as a result Mr. Humphrys proposed the ten technical amendments in committee which were adopted, but they did not catch these particular defects. The investment community certainly was not without sin, because they had a very direct interest in the amendments proposed by the bill and yet they did not bother to really look at them for some months. Even then it was only because of the initiative of one firm that the defect was discovered.

When the bill came back to the Senate for adoption of the amendments made by the House of Commons, I remember saying that I, as sponsor of the bill, was somewhat embarrassed that these defects had not been discovered at the committee stage in the Senate. I would have been even more embarrassed if I had known at the time—and this I didn't discover until after the bill had received royal assent—that the investment firm that I have referred to was a client of my law firm, and that it was one of the partners in my firm who discovered the defect. Incidentally, he was not aware that I was the sponsor of the bill in the Senate.

Certain officials in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs are holding a series of seminars across the country with persons interested in this bill. These seminars commence in Edmonton on February 20 and finish in Halifax on March 8. At these seminars there will be briefings on the contents of the bill, and the changes to the present act. Until these briefings have taken place and until the public, the legal profession, trademark agents and the business community have had a reasonable chance to study Bill S-11, a Senate committee should not, in my opinion, hold meetings on this bill. If the bill receives second reading, I will move that it be referred to committee, but I would not expect the committee to be able to complete its study before an election is called.

The real purpose in presenting this bill is so that it can go public, and so that everyone can have a reasonable length of time to consider its contents and make recommendations both to the department and to the Senate committee. There is no way that it can become law during this session of Parliament and there is, therefore, no urgency in considering the bill at the second reading stage. That does not mean that we should not have second reading, but just that it really doesn't matter whether there is second reading before March 8, after which date the seminars end and the officials of the department will be available to give evidence.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak on the bill tonight, but perhaps I may ask Senator Godfrey if it is not a rather extraordinary statement that there is no possible way this bill could become law in the present session. I do not know on what he bases that assurance, and I would be happy if, in reply to my question, he could tell me what makes him so sure.

I would also ask him if the changes in the licensing provisions to which he referred are an indication that the government is already aware of certain amendments that it will propose. If not, are these changes merely a matter of providing for the situation he referred to in regulations or licensing provisions which presumably would be governed by the regulations?

I would also ask him if, before proceeding any further to discuss this, he can explain the use of the word "otherwise" in clause 11. It says: "No person shall adopt, as a trademark or otherwise, any mark . . ." and so on. What is meant by "or otherwise"? This is a bill dealing with trademarks only. How far does the expression "or otherwise" take it? To me, that is an extraordinary expression.

Perhaps the honourable sponsor could explain to us the dimensions of the provisions of the bill. Does the expression "or otherwise" mean that any of the prohibitions in this bill can extend to anything, any use?

Senator Godfrey: I shall answer your first question as to why I do not think it will be passed before an election. I do not know when the election will be called, but I expect it will have to be called at the very latest in April. As I have explained, this is a highly complicated, technical piece of legislation, and I doubt that it would be possible for a Senate committee to consider it and give it the kind of treatment it should have after the seminars have been held. I have suggested that witnesses should be brought from the United States, for example, to inform us how some of these proposed provisions have actually worked in the United States. Moreover, as this process has been in train for eight years, there is no rush about it, and it should receive the full treatment in committee. From a practical point of view, therefore, it will not get through both the Senate and the House of Commons before an election is called.

As to the words "or otherwise," I haven't the vaguest idea what they mean, but I will certainly try to find out.

Senator Grosart: Do I take it from the general statement as to the lack of urgency in respect of the Senate's consideration of this bill that you would prefer we let it remain at this stage, and not refer it to a committee until some time after March 8? Would that be your preference?

• (2100)

Senator Godfrey: There is no reason why the debate should end before March 8. Some senators might like to take the time and the trouble to really go through the bill—which obviously Senator Grosart has done because he lit on these words "or otherwise," which mystify me as much as they mystify him. I hope we can get some kind of an explanation. Honourable senators will have a chance to study the bill, and if they wish to make speeches, make comments, or ask questions before it goes to committee, that is all to the good.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

OFF-TRACK BETTING

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE STUDY BY LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the feasibility of implementing a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada and any matter relating thereto, and, in particular,

(a) the economic effect such a system would have on the horse racing industry and on the distribution of industry revenues, particularly the revenues from pari-mutuel betting;

(b) the concept, structure and effectiveness of a so-called "home marketing area", for each track, with particular reference to equitability and enforceability;

(c) the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented; and

(d) the effect of such a system on society, its potential as a marketing tool of the industry and whether it would result in a reduction of illegal betting; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination, and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that the motion be not now adopted but that the Minister of Agriculture be asked to appear before the Senate, meeting in this chamber in a Committee of the Whole, to explain to all senators

(a) the need for a study on off-track betting,

(b) what information, if any, he or his department is lacking in order to decide whether it would be feasible to implement a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada, and

(c) the urgency at this time for such a study.—
(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Thursday of last week, February 8, in the course of the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the feasibility of implementing a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada and any matter relating thereto, the Honourable Senator Langlois raised a point of order, when he said, as it appears at page 519 of the Debates of the Senate for that day:

I should like to draw the attention of the Chair to rule 18, which is as follows:

18. When a bill or other matter relating to any subject administered by a department of the Government of Canada is being considered by the Senate or in Committee of the Whole, a minister, not being a member of the Senate, may on invitation from the Senate enter the Senate chamber and, subject to the rules, orders, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate, may take part in the debate.

This is not a matter which comes under any department of government. The main motion simply requests that the subject of off-track betting be studied by the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee of the Senate. Off-track betting is illegal in Canada under the Criminal Code. It is not something that comes under a specific department, and for that reason I do not see how the motion in amendment can be entertained at this time.

First, may I say that rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the rule on which the Honourable Senator Langlois bases his point of order, was adopted December 10, 1968, when the Senate approved the fourth report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate. The old rule read as follows:

18A. When a Bill or other matter relating to any subject administered by a department of the Government of Canada has originated in and is being considered by the Senate or in Committee of the Whole, a minister representing the Department not being a member of the Senate, may enter the Senate Chamber, and, subject to the Rules, Orders, Forms of Proceedings and usages of the Senate, take part in the debate."

The 1968 amendment deleted the words "originated in the Senate" and added that the minister may "on invitation from the Senate" enter the Senate chamber.

When the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate proposed the change in rule 18, it gave the following explanatory note, which is to be found at page 450 of the Journals of the Senate, Part I, 1968-69, "the words 'has originated in and' are deleted, and the words 'on invitation from the Senate' are added to broaden the Senate's right to invite a Minister relating to any matter."

The Honourable Senator Langlois suggests that off-track betting is not something that comes under a specific department. I have to disagree with this interpretation. The fact that a certain matter is prohibited does not necessarily mean that it is not within the competence of the Government of Canada or of a department thereof. As was pointed out by the Honourable Senator Grosart, the whole subject matter of betting comes under Part V of the Criminal Code of Canada, starting at section 179. I think that in rule 18 the words "relating to any subject administered by a department of the Government of Canada" are intended to mean any matter under the competence of the federal Government of Canada. In fact the French version of rule 18 conveys more accurately the intent when it says:

18. Lorsque le Sénat en tant que tel, ou réuni en comité plénier, étudie un bill ou une autre matière relative à quelque sujet relevant de l'administration d'un ministère du gouvernement du Canada, . . .

If off-track betting were to be legalized, it would most certainly be administered by a department and most probably by the Minister of Agriculture who at present is responsible, under section 188, paragraph 7 of the Criminal Code, for the making of regulations respecting the supervision and operation of pari-mutuel systems related to race meetings. It is my view that off-track betting is clearly a subject that falls within the competence of the federal government.

For these reasons I submit that the point of order raised by the Honourable Senator Langlois is not valid, and the motion in amendment proposed by the Honourable Senator Sparrow can be entertained by the Senate.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, according to Madam Speaker's ruling, Senator Flynn now has the floor and he can express his views on the motion in amendment.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Robichaud for his invitation. Had he not made it, I probably would have remained in my seat.

Senator Robichaud: I thought you were looking at Madam Speaker for direction.

Senator Flynn: No. In fact, I was wondering whether Senator Langlois wished to appeal the Speaker's ruling. I would invite Senator Langlois to smile for once.

Senator Langlois: Smile at you?

Senator Flynn: Yes, or at Madam Speaker.

Senator Langlois: It would be a waste of time.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate because I wanted to read the speeches made by Senators Sparrow and Olson and, as well, Senator Sparrow's motion in amendment. The motion in amendment invites the Minister of Agriculture to appear before the Senate, meeting in this chamber in Committee of the Whole—to my mind, it is not too important whether we are in Committee of the Whole or simply sitting as the Senate—to explain to all senators:

(a) the need for a study on off-track betting,

(b) what information, if any, he or his department is lacking in order to decide whether it would be feasible to implement a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada, and

(c) the urgency at this time for such a study.

The comment I made previously was that I doubted very much, even if this matter were referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, or a subcommittee thereof, that we would have time to consider it before the coming election. I still feel that way, and even more so in light of the comments made by Senator Godfrey a few moments ago.

What struck me in the comments made by both Senator Sparrow and Senator Olson is that the government apparently has practically all of the data or information it needs on this question. I am left wondering whether the minister simply wants the Senate—because any report of a committee of the Senate on this subject would have to be accepted or rejected by the whole Senate—to tell him what to do, or whether he wants us to collect more information and more data. If he wants us to make a decision for him, I think it is entirely unfair. It seems to me that it would be a good thing for us to discuss this with the minister and ask him, "What exactly do you want us to do?" I agree that the Leader of the Government has probably expressed as well as he could the wishes of the minister. But he is not in the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Justice, and what the minister has in mind could probably be made clearer and more convincing if the minister were to appear before us and tell us exactly what he has in mind and what he wishes us to do. I doubt that we could accomplish much anyway before dissolution takes place.

I find that this amendment is a reasonable one, and, since the Leader of the Government is usually very flexible, I expect he will want to reconsider this matter and invite the Senate to support the amendment.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise to support the position taken by Senator Flynn and to point out that this is a very unusual initiative on the part of the government. It may well be a very good one; but, on the other hand, it may be a very dangerous one. It may be a good one if it contemplates a new role for the Senate. It is not an entirely new role for the Senate, but it is certainly a new departure in government policy, namely, the reference to the Senate of a matter on which the government has doubts, in advance of announcing or deciding what its policy in regard to that matter may be. This may be an excellent new initiative, but, if so, I think Senator Sparrow has made a good point in saying that we should have the minister here. Our rules permit it—not necessarily in Committee of the Whole; as I have pointed out, the rule does not restrict his appearance here to a Committee of the Whole—but I think it would make a good deal of sense to have the minister come here and explain this new initiative, perhaps an exciting new initiative. It would be interesting to ask him if it is the government's intention to refer other matters to the Senate for pre-consideration to help the government make up its mind on policy. I say it may be a good thing. On the other hand, it may not. It may be giving any government, not necessarily this government, a rather unusual out to say, "Well, we cannot make up our minds on this matter—" and this is one where there has been public controversy for years—"instead of appointing a royal commission, we will refer this matter to the Senate."

Such a matter being referred to a royal commission, the assumption at least would be that the decision made by that body would be non-political and completely objective. The reason I see some danger in this is the possibility that the government would refer a policy decision to a body whose response might not be non-political. This is a matter which I think is worth further consideration.

It is for these reasons that I am not sure that this is a good thing or a bad thing. I would like to hear from this particular minister who, in the past, it has been said, has been one who has come out himself, on more than one occasion, for abolition of the Senate. Mr. Whelan has done that over and over again.

Senator Perrault: Saint Paul was converted on the road to Damascus.

Senator Grosart: I am delighted that this suggests a conversion, and that is one of the things I would like to find out.

Senator Asselin: He has changed his mind.

Senator Grosart: He is only one; he may have been a leader of a small band. I would like to find out if some of his followers have changed their minds as he has.

Senator Perrault: He may become one of the most zealous defenders of the Senate.

Senator Marshall: He might become a senator.

Senator Grosart: He might be more than a defender; he might be a great protagonist of the Senate; however, these are the kinds of questions that could be asked on this motion. The motion is that this matter be referred to the Senate and that it be referred to a Senate committee on the initiative of the government. Therefore, I completely support the suggestion made by Senator Sparrow on the very good arguments put forward by the Leader of the Opposition.

Surely this is one motion on which the Leader of the Government could reserve his decision for the moment, because on reflection I think he would agree that this is an occasion on which the Senate might learn a great deal about certain public attitudes towards the work of this chamber and its future.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to express one or two comments on this subject. It seems to me that this is a very routine and straightforward motion. I am not referring, of course, to Senator Sparrow's motion in amendment, but to the original motion that a standing Senate committee conduct an examination into a given matter. This is the type of reference given to our committees time and again on a variety of subjects.

I suggest that it should be the committee's decision as to when, in the context of the evidence it is taking, it would call upon the minister to appear before it. I can see absolutely no reason whatsoever why a normal motion of referring something to a committee should not carry.

Senator Grosart: It is not a normal motion; it is a very abnormal motion.

Senator van Roggen: You and I disagree on that. The fact of the matter is that there is a motion here to have a committee study a matter. Such motions have been put a great many times before, and I would suggest that, in keeping with past practice, the normal thing would be to allow the committee to decide how and in what order it would call its witnesses, including the minister.

I certainly appreciate the enthusiasm with which my good friend Senator Grosart anticipates the fun that could be had in having the minister come before the Senate while the opposition could go on a fishing expedition in this particular connection, but I do not think that is a parliamentary reason for abandoning the normal procedures. I would therefore support the motion and oppose the proposed amendment.

Senator Grosart: As a matter of clarification, I might ask the honourable senator if he meant to impute a motive to the opposition, the motive being a fishing expedition?

Senator van Roggen: I can only say that I used those words as a description of what you suggested a moment ago. If they are not accurate in that respect, I will leave the record to speak for itself.

Senator Flynn: If we were to "land" the Minister of Agriculture, he would be a big fish.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I did not have the opportunity of being present last week when this interesting subject was up for debate. I noticed the various remarks made by honourable senators. For some senators it is a matter of conscience as to whether it is moral or immoral, and the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee said that he personally would not touch it with a ten-foot pole; that he would not chair a subcommittee.

● (2120)

What struck me was that so much preliminary thought had gone on regarding this question that it would seem that the whole procedure had been quite well refined before the Senate, as a body, started discussing the subject matter.

The Honourable Eugene Whelan, so far as I know, had no discussion with any senator about this proposition before he announced it to the press. I am not saying whether he did or did not, but it seems to me that it is a rather strange way to hand the Senate a duty—for a minister, when he meets the press, to say, "This is a difficult question. I pretty well had my mind made up a few weeks ago, but it is not made up now. It is a kind of hot potato, so let us hand it to the Senate."

I am not insulted as a senator. I am complimented, because I think the Senate can handle a lot of hot potatoes, and if we got the hot potatoes before the government started handling them, the government and the country would be in a whole lot less trouble.

Senator Perrault said there should be a committee of the Senate to discuss the whole question of the Constitution. That was before the Pepin-Robarts commission got under way. Certainly if anyone showed foresight, knowledge and wisdom in his remarks, it was Senator Perrault in saying that the Senate itself was in a far better position to inquire into the whole question of evolving a Constitution that would serve more effectively our purposes as a nation. So I am not at all unhappy that the Senate has been asked to do this, although I do question whether we should just rush in and say, "The minister announced to the press that maybe we should do it," and therefore we say, "If you want us to do the job, we are at the ready and we will go ahead."

In my opinion, the conversion of the Honourable Eugene Whelan from being an enemy of the Senate to being something of a supporter of the Senate is really amazing, and most important. As Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, I can say we have found the Minister of Agriculture most cooperative in every respect. When we have brought a problem to him, he has been willing to consider it. He has appeared before our committee at various times and has been most constructive in his presentation, and, because of his attitude, has assisted the committee in its work. Together—the committee working independently and, at the same time, hearing the views of the minister—we have been able to accomplish a good deal in particular fields of agriculture.

In my opinion, we should seek the wishes of the Minister of Agriculture in this matter. I believe he should be invited, and we should hear what he has to say. If this is such an important question, a subcommittee of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee should undertake to arrange that we hear the views of the minister. I am sure he would be delighted to come.

An Hon. Senator: Before what committee?

Senator Argue: Before a Committee of the Whole, before all the senators, because this is the main body. The committees, important as they are—and certainly the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is one of the most important committees—

Senator Asselin: The most.

Senator Argue: I am corrected; it is the most important committee. Nevertheless, the Senate itself is superior to any committee of the Senate. I am sure the minister would like to come, and I would like to see him come.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (2130)

Senator Argue: I am sure he has a great deal of information to give and it will help us in making a judgment. I can think of nothing better, in the interests of the Senate—from the standpoint of public relations and publicity, of goodwill across the country—to have the Minister of Agriculture put this proposition before the Senate, and to answer questions. We are dealing with a contentious subject, one fraught with diverse opinions—a subject which, together with the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, I would much prefer not to touch—and I am sure that the information of the Minister of Agriculture would enable the Senate to reach a good and reasonable conclusion. The information that he is able to give the Senate as a whole would help both the Senate and the committee that will be dealing with this subject, should the motion pass. So I am happy to support the amendment to the motion, and, when that has been dealt with, I will be happy to support the motion.

Senator Grosart: And we will give him a great reception.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I shall not speak for too long. Senator Sparrow's amendment is one that is worthy of consideration. All he asks is that the Minister of Agriculture, who was a protagonist of the Senate, appear before a Committee of the Whole and tell us why he wants the Senate to study this particular question.

This is a question which is being seriously considered by organizers of fall fairs and exhibition associations across the country. Apparently he has a serious reason for asking the Senate to consider it. So what objection could he possibly have to coming before a Committee of the Whole and telling us why?

On January 31, as Senator Sparrow said, he was supposed to make a firm decision on whether or not to legalize off-track betting. He did not do it. He had sober second thoughts. That is probably one of the reasons why he should be in the Senate. We have every reason to believe that the Minister of Agriculture does not have very fond feelings for the Senate. So why not get to know him better. Bring him before a Committee of the Whole. Let him explain to us why he wants us to study the whole question of off-track betting.

As Senator Sparrow said, he, as well as other Ministers of Agriculture, has had the opportunity over a number of years to assess the whole situation. They have had briefs and representations from church groups, fall fairs, small fairs and large racetracks. Personally, I have no feeling one way or the other at present, but I would like to know—

Senator Asselin: Don't you gamble?

Senator Riley: Oh no, I don't gamble—only on five-cent slot machines in Las Vegas. We should have the opportunity to assess the whole situation, and as to whether or not we should study this.

Senator Cook: What is he going to do with the report, if he ever gets one?

Senator Riley: Senator Cook asks, "What is he going to do with the report, if he ever gets one?"

● (2140)

Senator Grosart: Give it to Joe Clark.

Senator Riley: What would he do with it? Or would he know? Have the minister come before a Committee of the Whole and explain the situation to us. If he does and justifies the suggestion that the Senate study this matter, then I will go along with it. But he should come before a Committee of the Whole.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate until the next sitting of the Senate. I think I should offer a word of explanation. Senator Sparrow is unavoidably absent tonight. I understand that he could not get away from his home to come here because of a snowstorm. We feel that in all fairness he should be here when this matter is finalized.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, January 30, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a department of the Government of Canada to deal with all matters relating to aging.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, since Senator Croll was good enough to include my name in support of his notice of inquiry calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a federal department of aging, I feel it my responsibility to make a few comments.

It should be obvious that with the conglomeration of departments already established in our government, we would be hard-pressed to convince the government that there is justification for the establishment of a separate department to deal with matters relating to aging, even though it might be desirable. I am sure Senator Croll would agree that the government's first reaction would be that our senior citizens are being well looked after by the Department of National Health and Welfare under our present minister. I am sure he would also agree that up to a point the government would be justified in its argument. I repeat, up to a point.

The honourable senator's notice of inquiry calls attention to the desirability of establishing a department of the Government of Canada to deal with all matters relating to aging. While I support the theory that more concentration of effort has to be directed towards the effects of aging on our citizens, whether or not the citizens referred to can best be benefited by a new department leaves plenty of scope for debate. If one reflects for a moment on the wide spectrum of our citizens who may be the subject of our discussion, it is difficult to find a starting point, because the problem is so vast.

As we look at the problem of aging and the relationship of the responsibility of the government in that area, we naturally look towards the Department of Health and Welfare, which is now most directly responsible, and which now oversees the agencies responsible under its jurisdiction that now deal with the problem. I think it is worthwhile pointing out that just recently, as mentioned by Senator Croll, the minister announced the creation within the department of a Bureau on Aging, which evidently she feels would fill a void, to improve communications between Canada's senior citizens and, most important, the organizations working on their behalf, noting that the bureau would become the focal point within her department to identify and keep abreast of issues relating to aging and the aged, and would provide the communication link between the federal government, provincial governments and the organizations for the aged. It would also be the contact point for individuals and senior citizens' organizations.

Further, the creation of such a bureau was recommended by the Canadian Labour Congress, the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation, and other organizations, as well as a number of provincial advisory councils.

I think it is worthwhile dwelling on the objectives of such a bureau as defined by the departmental agency under the Social Services Programs Branch. The bureau itself would be a very small organization unit, but would draw on expertise located in several branches of the department. The objectives of the bureau, as currently visualized, are to provide a national structure with which individuals and organizations may identify, and to which requests for information and other forms of assistance can be directed; further, to implement a liaison and clearinghouse function with other governmental and non-governmental organizations and representatives concerned with aging; also, to provide a means of identifying gaps in research, information, consultative and advisory services, so as to develop the most effective policies and to strengthen the department's ability to be of as much assistance to senior citizens as possible; to ensure the co-operation of the various elements of the department that are concerned with aging and with senior citizens in identifying the needs of older persons and to encourage the necessary research; and finally, to facilitate the development of policies, legislation and programs for elderly citizens.

Senator Croll made reference to this bureau in introducing his inquiry, but stated that his proposal would be more restrictive. He said:

My proposal is that we need an agency just for the aged.

With the greatest of respect, it is my opinion that the problems with aging cannot be restricted only to the aged, because aging affects every stage of an individual's life.

[Senator Marshall.]

If I might revert for a moment to the objectives of the bureau, they keep referring to the needs of senior citizens and identifying the needs of older citizens. Again this emphasizes the true restrictive thinking, because the problems of aging with which we are faced at present, and to which Senator Croll addresses himself, are a culmination of the mistakes made in every facet of our lives from infancy through early childhood, through adolescence, through middle age and through advanced age. So we must look at a much wider spectrum of the factors surrounding the problem.

For example, we must look at the effects of aging as a result of our diverse climatic conditions, such as in the northern parts of the country; the effects of aging on the many thousands of our citizens living in isolated or remote areas of our country, who are denied the normal health care because of that isolation. We must look at the effects of aging in the shortening of the life span of the too many who are poverty stricken and who are denied the normal requirements of nutritional foods, the lack of which deters a full life expectancy.

Senator Croll referred to the fact that there was a separate Department of Veterans Affairs, which is concerned mainly with the veterans of Canada, a segment of our society to which he devoted exemplary service himself. I mention this department to try to emphasize the need for liaison, mentioned in the bureau's objectives, with that department and others. To my mind, that department has the highest expertise in the knowledge gathered over some 65 years of experience in witnessing the effects of aging on hundreds of thousands of our youth, who experienced the fear of battle, the shortening of their lives as a result of incarceration in prisoner-of-war camps, for example. I refer to these particularly to point out the lessons learned of the effects of malnutrition, the beatings they endured and other serious hardships, brought out in a government report commissioned by the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Herman report, which prompted just two years ago, so many years later, the government to support the need for financial assistance to those veterans.

Certainly this same department has learned many lessons when being directly involved with those of our veteran citizens whose aging process and life span were shortened as a result of the loss of limb, the loss of damage to body organs, the effects of which shortened their life span and caused pre-aging, which is also incidentally recognized by that department.

So, too, can we look at the effects of aging on so many of the wives of many of these same veterans, who for so many years had to be denied the enjoyment of life to which they were entitled because they had to devote their young and adult life to those veterans who did, and do still in too many cases, require constant care—those same wives, who will be left alone one day, to reflect only with the remembrance of suffering and to age before their time with a feeling of bitterness.

I apologize for probably spending too much time on this segment of society, but I do so because there is a relationship between them and other citizens who have suffered similar effects through loss of limb, disablement from birth and job accidents. They have probably done so to a somewhat lesser degree, but certainly to a degree which requires our help. We can learn much in this respect not only through liaison with the devoted officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs, but also with the organizations for veterans, which can teach us a lesson or two about the effects of aging.

Another segment of our society that is neglected is that of the single parent. I am thinking particularly of the widow who must continue to exist after the death of her husband, more often than not at a level of poverty, faced as she is with the shock of adjusting to a new way of life under emotional stress, unable to cope with the budgetary burdens resulting from loss of income, along with many other factors that bring about deterioration of body and mind and which, in turn, result in deterioration of health and pre-aging. This places the burden of her continued well-being on the state, which unfortunately, until now, has not done a very good job of coping with the problem of the single parent and the widow.

I now turn to what I feel is the key to the prevention of problems of aging. I refer to the age at which life begins, namely, that of the infant.

The new Canadian infant citizen ages each day and goes through the stages of development of early childhood, adolescence and middle age to, finally, advanced age, which is the subject of our present discussion.

Senator Croll referred to the fact that for the last 20 years Canadian society has been struggling in a haphazard and unorganized fashion with the unprecedented increase in the numbers of young people in our population. I agree fully with him when he indicates that we have overlooked the fact that an ever-growing number of Canadians have been joining the ranks of the retired and semi-retired, and that we must begin to adjust our youth-oriented society in order better to meet the needs of our senior citizens and to plan for the time when our elderly can become a more dominant factor in our society.

To my mind, the best guarantee of a better adult life lies in the preparation we direct to the new-born, beginning with the ensuring of the health of the pregnant mother, and going on to ensure the proper development of the infant body through programs initiated by the appropriate department, the purpose of which should be provision to the infant of proper nutrition, a decent education, a decent and reasonable environment, and the highest quality of adult life.

These prerequisites are so fundamental that it should be impossible in our comparatively affluent society for thousands of Canadian mothers, unprepared in mind and body, to bear children, and for hundreds of thousands of our children to go to school lacking proper food, hungry and despondent, without the guidance and leadership of prepared parents and not knowing where to turn or how to cope with society. Yet our government and the many agencies responsible do not seem to be able to respond to these problems, though it would be so simple to initiate a school lunch program for undernourished children, for example. At the same time they can always find justification for dumping nutritional milk, valued at millions of dollars, that would help these children, or pass the responsibility to the provinces, which are just as apathetic about their responsibilities.

The government saw fit to establish a Ministry of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, which has set up an abundance of programs designed to promote the fitness of all Canadians. It is interesting to read the recent pamphlet they have produced on programs for people, and their slogan:

Participation in sports of physical recreation can enhance the quality of your life.

They prescribe Canadian home fitness tests, standardized tests for fitness, Canadian fitness award programs, exercise break packages, game plans, grants in aid for students, athletes' programs, national sport and recreation centres, and data based on sport. This department finds funding, despite restraints, to promote achievement of national recognition by, and the development of, a few who happen to exist in the affluent parts of our country, while too many of our youth remain underdeveloped because of the fact that they live outside the centre of society and are unable to take advantage of the too narrow efforts of government.

Certainly I can express my admiration for the Minister of State responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport—and I am sure she is directing her activities, with a non-partisan conscience, towards the achievement of a better and fitter society—but I fail to appreciate her lack of attention towards the underprivileged parent and child, and the restricted direction of effort that seems designed to favour the capable rather than providing dedicated leadership for the majority of our youth, who are denied the opportunity to prove themselves by their endeavours, whatever these happen to be. There is a need for liaison between other departments of government also, as, for example, in the case of the Department of National Defence, and its youth programs that are provided in the context of the cadet services of Canada and the reserves.

The effects of aging also concern the Department of Labour and those who should be concerned with the effects of the environment on our citizens. Too many of our citizens have their life span shortened by diseases attributable to the effects on our environment of the exploitation of our natural resources.

Honourable senators, the scope of Senator Croll's inquiry reaches beyond the Bureau of Aging which the minister responsible feels should be sufficient. At each major stage in the development of our citizens' lives, new challenges and considerations occur. We must be aware of what to expect and how to cope with conditions as they exist and as they develop.

Throughout life many factors influence proper development, such as good health habits, which keep the body in optimum physical condition, and regular exercise and good nutrition, which develop and maintain a strong vigorous body and allow a normal aging process. A person can be well nourished and still not be properly fit, but a person can never be physically fit without being well nourished. As I myself enter the advanced age phase of development, I have no quarrel with the thrust of Senator Croll's recommendations.

If, indeed, the government sees fit to assign areas of responsibility for our citizens, at whatever stage of development of their lives they may be, to the Departments of National Health and Welfare, Labour, National Defence, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Fitness and Amateur Sport, and all the other agencies concerned, it certainly seems worthwhile to give consideration at the same time to the establishment of a coordinating department, which, under a minister, would direct attention to the important objective of producing citizens that will make for a better Canada. I have no hesitation in supporting Senator Croll's efforts, cognizant as I am of the need to eliminate the waste of effort and expense presently being indulged in by the various departments of government, which should be directed to the satisfaction of the needs of Canadian citizens created by the changing conditions in this country, both in the short and the long term.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Deschatelets, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on Trust and Loan Companies for the year ended December 31, 1977, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Insurance Act, Chapter I-17, R.S.C., 1970.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Senator Olson presented Bill S-12, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Olson moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NATIONAL TELEVISION COVERAGE OF CANADA WINTER GAMES—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, in view of the objectives of the Canada Winter Games, particularly those now taking place in Brandon, Manitoba, can the Leader of the Government explain how the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is supposed to have a responsibility toward Canadians, can justify its devoting only six minutes to advertising the objectives of the Canada Games across this great country of ours?

● (1410)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I, too, have been rather mystified by the apparent lack of national television coverage of this event. I can provide no ready explanation at this time. May I suggest that honourable senators who are concerned about the matter should write to the President of the CBC, Mr. Al Johnson, with appropriate inquiries. Certain information will be sought by my office on the point.

I think all Canadians are most impressed with the marvelous job done by the people of Brandon, Manitoba, to host these games, and Newfoundlanders were magnificent hosts for the summer games last year. These events should certainly be given the kind of attention they deserve by our nationally tax-supported broadcast system.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I am thinking particularly of the people of Newfoundland. Regardless of the time difference, Newfoundlanders would like to be able to watch their athletes who are performing in the games that are now taking place in the great province of Manitoba.

The leader indicated that honourable senators should write to the President of the CBC, Mr. Al Johnson. That would be a waste of words and a waste of paper, though I have naturally taken the matter up with the CBC already, that being my job. I think, however, that the Senate and the leader should bring the matter to the attention of the CBC and the Secretary of State of Canada. I hope we have the unanimous consent of the Senate to do just that.

Senator Perrault: That will be done this afternoon.

AIR CANADA

STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT REGARDING SALE TO PRIVATE INTERESTS—QUESTION

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he has had an opportunity to talk to the Minister of Transport about the remarks of the President of Air Canada to the effect that the part of that corporation which is profitable could be sold to private interests, probably the suggestion being that the less profitable part be kept by the government so that it can be said in the future that the government cannot administer its crown corporations properly.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the circumstances of the situation which prompted these alleged statements by Mr. Taylor, and the contents of such statements, if in fact they were made, call for an explanation from the Minister of Transport. I hope to bring that explanation to the Senate at the earliest opportunity.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

COMPATIBILITY OF NEW HOSPITAL CHARGES IN ONTARIO WITH FEDERAL LEGISLATION—QUESTION

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he would, now or in the near future, assure this house that the new charges and user fees for hospitalized patients announced by the Ontario Minister of Health are compatible with the program conditions of the federal legislation known as the Hospital and Diagnostic Services Act.

Would the leader also assure us that the new charges do not impede or preclude reasonable access to insured services, and in particular that insured services will be made available upon uniform terms and conditions for the people of Ontario, since these charges appear to be exorbitant and a cause of hardship to many sick people?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

ENERGY

SUPPLY OF CRUDE OIL TO IMPERIAL OIL REFINERIES IN CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government inform the Senate whether it is true that the parent company of Imperial Oil Limited has either announced that it is about to cut, or has in fact cut, the supply of crude oil to the Imperial Oil refineries in Canada, and particularly to the company's refinery in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no information on this matter, I regret to say. I will send a message to my office immediately to see if we can have some late information from the Honourable Alastair Gillespie.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I have an important supplementary question. If it turns out that the supply of crude oil is being reduced, by what percentage is it being reduced and how will that percentage reduction affect the percentage reduction in the refined material produced by the refineries?

Senator Perrault: That further inquiry will be forwarded to the offices of the minister responsible for energy supplies. At the same time, I would request some detailed information in writing from the honourable senator, for I may have missed something in his earlier question.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Yes, certainly.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. In view of the persistent reports that there is going to be an increase in the price of food, ranging between 12 and 15 per cent, can the leader inform this house whether these figures tally with government estimates, and, if so, what measures is the government prepared to take in order to alleviate and minimize such an increase?

Senator Perrault: First of all, honourable senators, there is a disagreement with respect to the accuracy of certain figures relating to price increases in food. Without any question, however, food prices are rising at a troubling rate, together with costs and prices in other areas of the economy. I assure honourable senators that the government is most concerned about the impact of increased food prices in this country, and that active steps are being considered to help Canadian consumers to meet the problem.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

NATURAL RESOURCES REVENUE—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government when we can expect a reply to his undertaking to bring to this chamber a report from the Conference of First Ministers. I am particularly interested in that portion dealing with natural resources revenue and the management of those resources. The information that we have to date on the government's position is only fragmentary. I would hope that this report would bring out a full and detailed explanation of the government's position with respect to natural resources.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, when the question was first asked in the chamber, an inquiry went forth immediately and the response came back rather quickly—in fact, rather too quickly, I think, because it was in fragmentary form, incomplete and not the kind of response that I, as Leader of the Government in this chamber, wished to bring to honourable senators. I have asked for a fuller, more detailed reply, and I hope it will be available soon.

Senator Olson: Might we have an indication of when it may be available? Are there any documents now in the hands of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office setting out the federal government's position respecting this matter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only say that I do not think it is going to be a matter of days. Hopefully we will have something on the subject tomorrow. Certainly the appropriate sources are being pressed for an early reply. It is an important question and should not be answered in an incomplete form.

ENERGY

EXTENSION OF GAS PIPELINE FROM MONTREAL TO POINTS EAST—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, following the line of questioning with respect to energy in Atlantic Canada, I wonder if the Honourable Leader of the Government would give us a statement of the government's policy with respect to the extension of the gas pipeline from Montreal to points east. This question has been under discussion for the last little while, and it would be interesting to know if a policy decision has been arrived at.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I must take that question as notice.

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, may I follow up on a question raised a few minutes ago concerning the price of food? The Leader of the Government said that “active measures” were being considered. I think that is the phrase he used. Could he tell us what he had in mind when he used the words “active measures”?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, clearly it is not for me to announce the specifics of a program that may be initiated to assist the consumers of this country in their battle against the rising food dollar, but I want honourable senators to know that, together with other responsible political parties in this country, the party of which I am a member is concerned about this problem.

A number of accusations have been made about inordinate profits. The truth of these allegations has yet to be established. There are possible measures which can be taken to make consumers more aware of food values that exist in the marketplace. Measures are under discussion, and the specifics of these measures must be announced by another member of the ministry.

LOUIS RIEL

POSTHUMOUS PARDON—QUESTION

[Translation]

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Is the government or some other authority considering the possibility of rehabilitation of Louis Riel, although posthumously?

● (1420)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a number of recommendations and representations have been received over a period of many years with respect to a posthumous pardon for Louis Riel, and the government has an active file on the matter. The question is under review, together with other matters of this kind.

Senator Marchand: Is the Honourable Senator Maurice Riel a relative of Louis Riel?

[Translation]

Senator Riel: Honourable senators, I will reply to Senator Marchand that we do have with Louis Riel some rather remote but real family ties, since we have a common ancestor who arrived in this country and settled in Lanoraie, near Montreal, in Quebec. Moreover, we are not sure but we think he had an Irish name; perhaps he was called Riley. However, as usual in Quebec common sense prevailed and we are now called Riel.

As for Louis Riel, I strongly support that request but I wonder if it is absolutely necessary. I would like to make a review of pardons granted in the past. The posthumous legislation passed to grant to Louis Riel the title he is now given, Founder of the West, has nothing to do with a condemnation which is rather meaningless in history.

However, it did alienate the province of Quebec. It was one of the serious crises, perhaps as serious as or even more so than the one which we are now experiencing. If the French Canadians between 1885 and 1890—because there were other events in 1890, as it was the year when the French language was abolished in Manitoba—if from 1890 to 1900 the French Canadians in Quebec emigrated to the United States at an annual rate of 100,000, that is one million in ten years, they did not settle in western Canada. No need to look for the true reasons which prevented French Canadians in Quebec from going west at that time. It was not a very hospitable and friendly land for Quebecers. There was more hospitality in New England and in the United States.

Does that answer your question, Senator Marchand?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

BUDGET FOR THE OMBUDSMAN PROGRAM—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 20—By Senator Marshall:

1. What is the budget for the CBC program entitled: Ombudsman?
2. How many employees are engaged in the production of the program?
3. How many cases have been dealt with by Ombudsman since its inception?
4. How many have been resolved in favour of the applicant?

Reply by the Secretary of State of Canada:

I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. It has not been customary to require the CBC to provide such details of its internal management and administration as the budgets of its programs. The background to this custom is explained in detail in the reply to Senator Norrie's question of December 16, 1976 (see Senate Debates, March 8, 1977, page 466).

2. 21.

3. Approximately 12,000 cases have been dealt with or are in the process of being dealt with. Of these, 233 cases have been the subject of telecasts.

4. Cases submitted to “Ombudsman” are dealt with in one of two ways. From the outset it was felt that “Ombudsman” could not offer to help people who wrote and then help only those whose cases were chosen for television, discarding the rest. “Ombudsman” has, therefore, been a television program, telecast from October to April, as well as a service carried on throughout the year.

All mail is acknowledged and all cases are logged and filed under a numerical-alphabetical system. Help is provided by referring the complaint to an agency competent to handle the complaint, by clarifying the complainant's rights, by speeding up the government process, or by sometimes leading to a reversal of an official decision. Because of the nature of help provided, no count can be made of cases which have been resolved in favour of the applicant.

OFF-TRACK BETTING

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

On the Order:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the feasibility of implementing a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada and any matter relating thereto, and, in particular,

- (a) the economic effect such a system would have on the horse racing industry and on the distribution of industry revenues, particularly the revenues from pari-mutuel betting;
- (b) the concept, structure and effectiveness of a so-called "home marketing area", for each track, with particular reference to equitability and enforceability;
- (c) the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented; and
- (d) the effect of such a system on society, its potential as a marketing tool of the industry and whether it would result in a reduction of illegal betting; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination, and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook, that the motion be not now adopted but that the Minister of Agriculture be asked to appear before the Senate, meeting in this chamber in a Committee of the Whole, to explain to all senators

- (a) the need for a study on off-track betting,
- (b) what information, if any, he or his department is lacking in order to decide whether it would be feasible to implement a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada, and
- (c) the urgency at this time for such a study.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, when I moved the adjournment of this matter last evening I mentioned the unavoidable absence of our colleague Senator Sparrow. After the sitting I telephoned Senator Sparrow and told him what had happened. He appreciated what we had done and was agreeable to having the matter proceed, as he was unable to attend due to weather conditions.

[Senator Marshall.]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few brief comments about the amendment to the main motion. I think it is appropriate to read the wording of the motion in amendment:

That the motion be not now adopted but that the Minister of Agriculture be asked to appear before the Senate, meeting in this chamber in a Committee of the Whole, to explain to all senators

- (a) the need for a study on off-track betting,
- (b) what information, if any, he or his department is lacking in order to decide whether it would be feasible to implement a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada, and
- (c) the urgency at this time for such a study.

Apparently, the wording of this amendment left some honourable senators under the impression that the Minister of Agriculture was the only person responsible for referring this matter to the Senate. There is nothing further from the truth than that. This reference was made to the Senate at the request of the full cabinet. I do not wish to divulge any cabinet secrets, but I have no doubt that this was possibly referred to the Senate on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture supported by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is also a member of the cabinet. This was not referred, or even suggested, to the Senate by the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Phillips: You are really not improving anything.

Senator Langlois: If you listen, perhaps you will have an opportunity of understanding something.

This motion calls for the Minister of Agriculture to be invited to appear before the committee to explain the need for a study on off-track betting; to state what information, if any, he or his department is lacking in order to decide whether it would be feasible to implement a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada; and to explain the urgency at this time for such a study. This information could be obtained by the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs under the main motion. The Minister of Agriculture and his officials will, no doubt, be invited to appear before that committee to provide whatever information they can so that the committee may reach a final decision on the matter.

I would say that the substance of this motion in amendment is not very impressive and, to a degree, one could even say that it is entirely futile because it seeks to do what will be accomplished by the Senate committee acting under the terms of reference contained in the main motion. This having been said, I will close my remarks by saying that I oppose this amendment because of its futility.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the feasibility of implementing a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada and any matter relating thereto, and, in particular,

(a) the economic effect such a system would have on the horse racing industry and on the distribution of industry revenues, particularly the revenues from pari-mutuel betting;

(b) the concept, structure and effectiveness of a so-called "home marketing area" for each track, with particular reference to equitability and enforceability;

(c) the legislative and regulatory framework in which such a system would be best implemented; and

(d) the effect of such a system on society, its potential as a marketing tool of the industry and whether it would result in a reduction of illegal betting; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purpose of the said examination.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cook:

That the motion be not now adopted but that the Minister of Agriculture be asked to appear before the Senate, meeting in this chamber in a Committee of the Whole, to explain to all senators

(a) the need for a study on off-track betting,

(b) what information, if any, he or his department is lacking in order to decide whether it would be feasible to implement a system of legalized off-track betting in Canada, and

(c) the urgency at this time for such a study.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. I declare the motion in amendment defeated.

Shall the main motion carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate on this matter on the understanding that others wished to participate in the debate. Now that there is a bill before us dealing with this subject, it is my opinion that this order could be considered as having been debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this order is considered as having been debated.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL SESSION, LISBON, PORTUGAL— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-fourth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held in Lisbon, Portugal, from 25th to 30th November, 1978, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to thank all those members of this chamber and those of the other place who supported me in my quest for the chairmanship of the NATO Parliamentary Association last November. I appreciated their support then, and I continue to appreciate it. It has brought both honour and challenge to myself.

Senator Langlois: And to the Senate.

Senator McDonald: I hope I will prove to be worthy of the challenge.

We have recently returned from the Twenty-fourth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held in Lisbon, Portugal, from November 25 to 30 last. I want to take this opportunity, on behalf of the Canadian delegation, to thank the Government of Portugal for the facilities that were made available for both our plenary sessions and our committee meetings. I also want to thank the people of Portugal for the hospitality extended to the delegates of the 15 member nations on that occasion.

As all honourable senators are aware, Portugal is going through some very difficult and troubled times. It is a young democratic nation endeavouring to build on the fragile democracy that exists at the moment. It is undoubtedly one of the poorest nations in Europe and, as such, needs our help and understanding.

Some member nations of NATO are already giving assistance to Portugal. Three that come immediately to mind are the United States, the United Kingdom and Germany. Portugal needs our help as well, and it is my hope that the Canadian government and the Canadian people will see fit to lend a hand to this struggling nation in the hope that its people will be able to strengthen their democracy and play an even more important role in the concerns of the Western World in future years than they have in the past.

The Canadian delegation that proceeded to Portugal consisted of 18 delegates and two staff members. Our staff members were Peter Dobell and Colonel Bowie, both of whose names, I am sure, are familiar to all honourable senators. The 18 delegates were made up of 14 members of the House of Commons and four members of the Senate. My colleagues from the Senate were Senators Marchand, Walker and Yuzyk and I take this opportunity to express my thanks and appreciation for their participation in the committee and plenary meetings held in Lisbon.

I also want to mention some of the delegates from the House of Commons, and thank them for their participation in the meetings.

As honourable senators are aware, there are five standing committees under the rules of the North Atlantic Assembly. The Economic Committee was headed by Ursula Appolloni. My thanks must go to her for representing the point of view of the Canadian delegation on that committee.

The Education, Cultural Affairs and Information Committee was headed by Ralph Stewart, and he not only headed the Canadian delegation to that committee, but he is the North Atlantic Assembly chairman of the committee.

Senator Yuzyk is rapporteur of a Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, and he is also on the Education and Cultural Affairs Committee. My thanks and appreciation go to Senator Yuzyk also.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McDonald: The Political Committee was headed by the Honourable George Hees who has performed this function on many previous occasions, and George has always done a fine job on behalf of Canada. We were pleased to see him in that position again this year. My thanks also go to him.

Ian Watson headed our group in the Science and Technology Committee, and he is also rapporteur of that committee. Ian, I think, has probably brought more new and fresh ideas to the Science and Technology Committee than any delegate from any other country, and our thanks must go to him.

I was hoping that my colleague Senator Marchand would be with us at this time, because I want to tell you of a happening while we were in Lisbon when some of the European delegates were discussing trade unions in their own countries. Jean Marchand is fairly knowledgeable, as we all know, with respect to the labour movement in Canada, and he is also very knowledgeable with respect to labour unions around the world. It was interesting to watch him set some of the delegates from European countries straight with respect to the activities of labour unions in their own countries.

I had the privilege of serving on the Military Committee, and I am, in fact, rapporteur of its Subcommittee on Defence Co-operation.

I would also like to mention the fact that Peter Bawden, M.P., was with the delegation. He had not been selected by his party as one of the delegates because they have a rotating system, as have other parties, for choosing their delegates. But Peter Bawden on many occasions, including this November visit to Portugal, has paid his own way and attended our committee and assembly meetings and has played a very worthwhile role in our activities over the past number of years. I think all of us must appreciate the fact that there is a member of Parliament who is prepared to pay his own way to represent his country at conferences held abroad.

I would like now to turn to a short presentation with respect to military matters, and I do so not because of a lack of interest in the other four committees. I realize that if the member nations of NATO do not have strong economies we are not going to have a very representative military force, and that if educational and cultural affairs are not high on the agendas of all our member nations we are going to suffer militarily. The same thing can be said with respect to the Science and Technology Committee and the Political Committee. Every military move has a political connotation, and I suggest that every political move also has a military connotation, but I turn to military matters because those are the ones I think I know a little more about than I do the subjects dealt with by the other standing committees.

I think I can say without fear of contradiction from knowledgeable people that NATO today faces the greatest military threat in its history. That threat is real, and it is expanding year by year in both conventional and nuclear terms. When I speak about nuclear terms, I mean not only strategic nuclear weaponry, but tactical nuclear weaponry as well.

Perhaps this is the time when we should all pause to review the progress NATO has made since it came into existence some 30 years ago. You will recall that NATO was formed and brought into being in order to stop the spread of the Soviet Union and communism across eastern Europe progressing ever westward. During the period from 1949 to 1967, NATO had what was referred to as a "trip-wire response." In 1949 the United States of America had almost a monopoly in strategic nuclear weaponry, and a trip-wire response simply meant that troops of the NATO members were stationed in Europe, in Germany, in the hope that they could blunt a Soviet conventional attack, but, if that attack should succeed to the point where it tripped the wire—the trip-wire response—then we would have a world nuclear holocaust. But the strategy was successful, simply because of the overwhelming superiority of the United States strategic nuclear capability.

By 1967 the Soviet Union had built up its strategic nuclear force to the point where it was virtually in balance with that of the United States. So that strategy would no longer work because there were virtually equally balanced forces between the Soviet Union and the United States in strategic nuclear weaponry.

In 1967, therefore, the strategy was changed from that of a trip-wire response to that of a flexible response, because in that period from 1949 to 1967, when the Soviet Union was building up to parity in strategic weaponry, the United States gained superiority in tactical nuclear weaponry—battlefield weaponry, not intercontinental weaponry.

This new response was called a flexible response, which meant that if the Soviet Union and her satellites, the Warsaw Pact nations, were to invade Europe, then there would be a flexible response, first using conventional weaponry and, if that failed, then using tactical nuclear weaponry, and, if that failed, moving to strategic nuclear weaponry. That was a step forward. Again it was successful for that period from 1967 to 1973.

By 1973 the Soviet Union had reached parity in tactical nuclear weaponry. Not only had the Russians become comparable in strength in tactical nuclear weaponry but they had commenced the most fantastic buildup of conventional weaponry that the world has ever known. So the strategy of NATO changed again in 1973 from that of a flexible response to a forward conventional defence. In other words, troops that had been stationed further from the West German-East German border, deeper west in the Netherlands, Belgium and France, were moved forward virtually up to the front line, the strategy being that with our forces forward, virtually on the front line, the chances of blunting an attack from the Soviet Union and her allies with conventional weaponry were much greater than if those troops remained back on the soil of their own countries. This strategy has proved to be successful to date.

On previous occasions I have placed on the record the imbalance of conventional forces as between the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact nations on the one hand, and NATO on the other. Today I will do no more than refresh your memories of some of the figures already on record.

The Warsaw Pact nations have about 300,000 more troops on the front line than NATO members do. You will recall that a year ago I told you the Warsaw Pact nations had about 20,000 tanks on the front line or immediately in reserve. Today the Soviet Union have 42,000 tanks, 30,000 of them either on or immediately behind the western front. Let me remind you of the situation in 1940 when Adolph Hitler struck out for the channel. Do you know how many tanks he had? He had 400. But the Soviet Union today has 30,000 tanks in a similar position. We have about nine.

Senator Grosart: Nine thousand?

Senator McDonald: Nine thousand, yes. I hope.

Senator Perrault: What army are you talking about, Senator Grosart?

Senator McDonald: The same disparity exists with respect to heavy and light artillery and rockets, and with respect to aircraft and to the navy.

The Russians, from the date of the Cuban crisis when they had nothing more than a coastal navy, have built the largest navy in the world. Today it has a presence in every ocean of the world, and it simultaneously holds exercises in every ocean of the world.

To put it another way, the Russians learned many things between 1965 and 1978 apart from how to play hockey. In 1965 there was a tank ratio of two to one in favour of the Soviet Union. Today it is three to one. In 1965 there was a ratio of 1.5 to 1 in favour of the Soviet Union in respect of artillery—heavy, light and rocket. Today that ratio is two to one. The ratio for armoured personnel carriers in 1965 was about one to one; today it is 1.2 to 1.

Not only have they improved in numbers, but the sophistication of their weaponry is superior to anything the world has ever known.

In 1965 their tanks were inferior to ours. Today they are superior. The T-80, which is being produced today by the Soviet Union, will be the equivalent of the Leopard Mark II, which is not yet in production, and the XM-I built in the United States and which is also not yet in production.

Their artillery in 1965 was considered to be equal to that of the west. Today it is superior. Their armoured personnel carriers were inferior in 1965. Today they are superior. Their aircraft were considered to be inferior in 1965. They are now equal, if not superior, to any in the west. Their tactical aircraft were inferior in 1965, and today they are at least equal to those of the west.

● (1450)

These are worrisome facts, but another matter which we must look at should cause us even greater concern. I refer to the productivity of the Soviet Union and its ability to research and develop, to manufacture, and put in place modern armaments.

In 1979 the Soviet Union will have the capacity to produce 3,000 tanks, either T-72s or T-80s. They will produce this year 1,000 fighters, including four new ones with a capability to look down on, and shoot down, new technology. They will produce this year 300 missiles, most of which will have the capability of the SS-20 or the SS-22.

I would remind honourable senators that in the arsenals of NATO we have no answer to the SS-20 or the SS-22, and I shall refer to that later when I say a few words about SALT. Most of those 300 missiles will be MIRVs. What does MIRV mean? It means that they have multiple re-entry vehicles. Launch one rocket, and when it gets into the atmosphere out pop 10 rockets, and they hit 10 targets at once. They will produce 300 of those this year.

They will produce 1,000 intercontinental ballistic missiles this year, including four new missiles. We have no idea what the Soviet Union is spending on research and development for armament purposes, but, from the list of figures that I have read out, it is obvious that it is a tremendous amount. We do know what they are spending on one program. In this year, 1979, they will spend the equivalent of $1 billion U.S. on research into and development of high energy lasers—and I will refer to lasers a little later on in my remarks.

The defence budgets of the Soviet Union and her allies in the Warsaw Pact are about the equivalent of the defence budgets of the member countries of NATO. But they spend a far greater percentage of their gross national product on defence than any other nation in the world. This year it is estimated they will be spending between 13 per cent and 14 per cent of their gross national product on defence. This has been rising by about 4 to 5 per cent annually over the last several years. We should remember those figures—there is an annual increase of from 4 per cent to 5 per cent, and from 13 per cent to 14 per cent of their gross national product is now spent on defence.

What do we spend in Canada? I am almost ashamed to tell you. The figure is 1.8 per cent. In the percentage of our gross national product spent on defence, we are the second lowest of any member of NATO. That is not good enough.

Senator Bosa: Which country is the lowest?

Senator McDonald: In NATO? The United States spends 6 per cent; the United Kingdom, 5 per cent; France, 3.6 per cent; Germany, 3.4 per cent; and Belgium, 3.4 per cent.

Not only is our expenditure on national defence out of line with that of a potential aggressor, but it is unbalanced. We do not get value for the money that we do spend. In the committee to which I referred—the Subcommittee on Defence Co-operation, a Subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Defence, of which I am rapporteur—those are some of the problems with which we are trying to cope, namely, the extravagance and waste of the money that we now spend on defence and defence-related matters.

For instance, in 1979 the United States will spend approximately $13 billion on research and development in the armaments industry. The European member countries of NATO altogether will spend about $5 billion. That would give us, if it were properly administered, a total R & D budget of $18 billion, which is sufficient to do the job if we received value for dollars spent. But it is estimated that $4 billion of the $5 billion will be spent by European countries on research that will be duplicated in the United States. So we are left with a true expenditure of $14 billion instead of $18 billion.

Let me give some examples of how this money is wasted. I am sure that most honourable senators are aware of two missile systems that are used by NATO today. I believe that virtually all member countries of NATO use them. I refer to the Sparrow, which is a medium-range missile, and the Sidewinder, which is a short-range missile. Both of those missiles need to be updated. We do not believe it is necessary to spend all of the R & D money on developing a new missile. It is too expensive and takes too much time. If one were going to develop a new missile from scratch—if past experience is any evidence on which to base future experience—it means that from the day one makes the decision until the day the missile is deployed in the field 13 years will have passed. We do not have that amount of time, and it is too expensive, anyway.

What we need to do, I repeat, is to update the Sparrow and the Sidewinder. The R & D associated with the updating of any one of them would cost approximately half a billion dollars. But at this very moment the United States is engaging in research and development to update both of them. So is France, so is the United Kingdom, and so is Germany. They are all spending R & D money to develop a replacement or an updated Sparrow and Sidewinder.

We propose that the United States should be responsible for the R & D of the medium-range missile, and that European nations should be responsible for the R & D of the Sidewinder, the short-range missile. Once that improved missile is ready for production, the technology should be shared between North America and Europe, and production should take place on both sides of the Atlantic. This, to us, makes sense, and it would mean co-operation among nations. It would mean a true two-way street, both in R & D and in production.

As a matter of fact, we need co-operative programs in virtually every area of defence production. The areas in which the technology of the United States is much higher than that of Europe should be left entirely to the United States. But where the technology on both sides of the Atlantic is equal—we believe there are areas where this is so—then the countries should develop that weaponry in co-operation with each other, the technology should be swapped, and the manufacture of the weaponry should take place on both continents.

This can be said with respect to many weapons. For instance, an argument that has gone on for far too long with respect to a new tank gun has finally been solved, and a new 120-millimetre smooth bore gun will be used by both the United States and Germany.

● (1500)

The two other missiles that are outdated—and they are outdated simply because they do not have the power to penetrate the armament of either a T-72 or a T-80 tank—are the TOW and the Hawk. Again we believe that these weapons should be remodelled in preference to developing new ones.

Here is another example of what has happened, and I am not knowledgeable enough on the subject to know whether it was the right move or not. You will recall that not too long ago President Carter of the United States scrapped the American program on the B-1 bomber. Why did he scrap it? The B-1 bomber was going to be a very expensive project. As a matter of fact, in order to build 200 B-1 bombers, and to carry that cost from research and development through the production of the 200 planes, would cost $25 billion. That is $125 million per aircraft. The reason for that tremendous cost was the necessity of building into the aircraft the capability to cope with modern electronic ground-to-air missiles capable of destroying that aircraft. President Carter said, "No." Again I do not know whether he was right or wrong, but people will no doubt argue both sides of the question. President Carter then asked, "Why do we not update the old B-52 bomber, and why do we not put the cruise missile on it so that we do not have to fly over the target and attack it? All we have to do is fly up to within four or five thousand kilometres of it, launch the cruise missile and go home." So this is what is being done.

The technology that is available today does not necessarily mean that it can only be used in new weaponry. It can be used to update an awful lot of weaponry that is already in existence, and my belief is that the only way that we can cope with our friends in the Soviet Union is to remodel, restructure and update a lot of the equipment that we already own.

Another example of what can be done with the present equipment is the 155-millimetre gun which is used by most armies in western Europe. This gun is now used as a mine layer. It is also used as an anti-tank gun and as an artillery piece. One might ask, "How do you lay mines with a 155-millimetre artillery piece?" Well, mines are no longer large round things, they no longer weigh from 30 to 50 pounds, and the sappers no longer have to go out and dig a hole in the ground, put them in and cover them up. Today they weigh 1.3 pounds. You load them inside a 155-millimetre shell, and place them exactly where you want them by the use of a copperhead on the shell.

The only person who has to go forward is one trooper with the equipment to lay a laser where he wants the mines. You then fire the gun, the shell homes in on the laser and deposits the mines exactly where you want them. The mines are 90 per cent accurate in the destruction of a T-72 tank.

I was going to describe what happens if you step on one, but of course, you do not step on them. In years gone by if you stepped on a mine it blew your leg off. Now they do not go off in the ground. They have trip wires all over the place like spider webs, and if you trip the wire, the mine flips up in the air four or five feet and goes off. These weapons are unthinkable, but they are there today. It is only such advanced technology that enables us to produce superior weaponry, so that we can meet the threat from the Soviet Union and her allies.

We talk about the cost of modern weaponry. How can we use a modern tank to do a job that can be done with an artillery piece? A modern tank costs about $1 million. I am not sure what a copperhead missile costs, but it would be many times less than that.

How can you use aircraft against tanks today? Our aircraft cost something between $12 million and $25 million apiece. What we have to develop is weaponry with an accuracy that enables us to shoot something, rather than shoot at it. That capability exists today. Out of 100 rounds fired there are 90, or 95, or even 99 hits. There is no such thing any more as ranging. If you have a laser hooked on to that desk there, you will hit the desk from 15 miles away. This is the kind of world in which we live, and this is why I say, and repeat, that I believe we ought to be spending more than 1.8 per cent of our gross national product on defence—not in order to win a war, but to prevent our having to fight one. Of course, if we do have to fight a war then, yes, we have to win it.

I want to say a few words about what is happening in our own armed forces, and about some of the purchases we have made. I want it clearly understood at the outset that I do not make these remarks with any criticism in mind. I make them because I do not know the answers to the problems, and, of course, we have no facilities in this chamber for getting answers. You will recall that recently Canada purchased 128 new Leopard C-1 tanks. Some of these are now stationed in Europe, and others in Canada, where they are used for training purposes.

My major concern is those that are in Europe. When we were buying new tanks—and I am simply asking a question—why did we not complete the purchase and buy some ground-to-air defence for those tanks? If my information is correct, we literally have no ground-to-air defence for them. The purchase of those tanks, in my view, was far too big an investment to make without at the same time investing in protecting them from the air. Again, I do not know the answer to this question.

We are now in the process of trying to decide what kind of aircraft we are going to buy to replace the Voodoo 101 and the F-104. Some of these aircraft will be based in Europe, and, again, the airfield from which those new fighters will fly has virtually the same air defence system as existed in 1944. I suggest that it is worthless. It is true that we have miles of reinforced concrete for the aircraft to take off from and land on, and that we have huge reinforced concrete hangars to park them in. But what protection have they got when they are coming in to land, while they are landing, while they are taxiing over to a hangar for shelter, and when they leave the hangar to take off again? They have none.

I suppose they have, at least, the Bofors gun. Well, Bofors guns have had their day. In my view, we should have bought the Gepard system from Crous-Maffi, both to protect our tanks, which are made by Crous-Maffi as well, and to protect our aerodromes. This is a mobile air-to-ground defence system. We do not have it.

Another problem we have with our fighters in Europe is to keep the runways serviceable. In my day if somebody bombed the runway, they would blow a hole in it about the size of my office—and my office is not very big. Nowadays, if they blow a hole in a runway, it will be at least as big as this building, and it could be as big as Parliament Hill. We have 37 aerodromes at our disposal in Europe. When I say "we", I mean NATO.

I was talking about the SS-20 a few minutes ago. You fire one rocket off, and 10 projectiles come out of it, and 10 aerodromes are out of use. If you fire four rockets, then 37 aerodromes are out of use. We have no facility for patching the runways—no equipment; no trained men; nothing. If we are going to spend $2.3 billion on airplanes, surely to goodness it makes sense to give them some ground-to-air defence. Give them something to fly from, and some means of keeping the runways serviceable. Again I am asking questions. Perhaps there are answers to those problems—I do not know. These are things that I have seen and wondered about, and these are questions that we ought to be asking.

What about some of the new aircraft which will be used for the defence of North America? The press are not here, as usual, but when I am continually reading articles in the daily newspapers and magazines written by all kinds of know-nothings saying that there is no threat to North America from manned bombers, I think that people who write and think that way must live on Hash Street. A lot more people are going to read those articles than are going to read my speech, and I suggest that there is not one damn word of truth or sense in those articles.

A threat to this continent? Why, do you know that at this very moment there are roughly 800 Russian aircraft with the capacity to bomb North America and return home? What about the TU-95, known as the Russian Bear? It can fly from deep inside the Soviet Union to any target in North America and return. If they don't intend to use it, what have they got it for? What about the M-4 Bison which can also fly from deep inside the Soviet Union to North America and return? What about the Badgers and the Blinders? They both have refuelling capability, and by refuelling they can also fly from the Soviet Union to this continent. What about their new Backfire? The Backfire flies at Mach 3, and with one refuelling it can reach any target in North America from Russia. All they have to do is put a refuelling probe on it, and they are installing them today. Recent photographs of Backfire bombers show that they are all equipped with refuelling probes. Why? You say there is no threat? The threat is greater today, or is as great as it has ever been.

Not only do they have this capability, but commencing in 1974 they started a research and development program for a new long-range bomber with supersonic dash speed, and that airplane will be coming into production in 1983. Let no one tell you there is no threat to the North American continent.

On past occasions I have proposed that we ought to have some sort of committee structure in the Senate so that defence matters can be discussed from time to time, and we have never taken any positive step forward. I think it is long overdue.

A proposal has been made—and I have made this proposal myself—that perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs should take on a study of defence. I am not sure that that is the answer. According to the Rules of the Senate of Canada, the Foreign Affairs Committee is composed of so many members, and to it —shall be referred, if there is a motion to that effect, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to foreign and commonwealth relations generally, including . . . (iv) defence—

This would be a reference for a special study of defence. In my view, that is not what is needed. In my view, members of this chamber should be familiar with defence matters on a day-to-day, week-to-week, and month-to-month basis rather than as a one-shot affair.

There is a lot of work that this house can do, and a lot of work that it does do, but I suggest that unless we pay more attention to defence and freedoms of the world, then the vast bulk of work that goes on here will not be worth a tinker's dam.

I should like to conclude by saying a few words in respect to SALT—the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty. Of course, this is a treaty that has been negotiated between the United States and the Soviet Union, but it has implications for all of us. This treaty, if it is signed, and if the Senate of the United States passes it, will affect the development of the armaments industry for many years to come. It could, if it is a good treaty, be helpful in preserving peace. On the other hand, if it is a bad treaty, it could be responsible for a third world war. I suggest to you that it is a concern not only of American senators, but it should be a concern of Canadian senators and to Canadian people generally.

It will take a two-thirds vote for this treaty to pass the United States Senate. It will take a 51 per cent majority to amend it.

There are portions of this treaty that concern me. It is a difficult treaty to read, let alone understand—it is 62 pages long. The concern I have is: How do you define the difference between theatre nuclear weaponry and strategic nuclear weaponry? Not only is this difference between strategic or theatre nuclear weapons of concern to Europeans, it must be of concern to North Americans because the Backfire bomber that I mentioned a few moments ago, and which carries nuclear weaponry, is not included in SALT. The SS-20 that I referred to is not included in SALT. They are outside the treaty for the term of the protocol period, which is three years.

● (1520)

The Soviet Union is free to build all the Backfire bombers, all the SS-20 missiles, and all the SS-22 missiles it wants. To make a Backfire bomber an intercontinental weapon, all you do is put a refuelling probe on it. To make an SS-20 an intercontinental ballistic missile, all you do is put one more rocket on it—put on three stages instead of two. They are left outside the treaty.

It is my belief that both of these weapons ought to be included in SALT, if not to protect ourselves in North America, then at least to protect our colleagues and friends in Europe. Those weapons are there today, sitting ready on their launching pads, but they are not included in SALT.

Another concern I have is that the treaty calls for an agreement not to deploy sea- or land-based cruise missiles with a range of more than 600 kilometers. Six hundred kilometers from the East German-West German border covers a lot of western Europe, but there is not one single target 600 kilometers from that same border in the other direction. All targets in the Soviet Union are beyond range. Why confine the range of a cruise missile to 600 kilometers? We believe it is possible to shoot it 6,000 kilometers, and perhaps more. I do not understand why anyone would support a treaty that, to me, seems so unfair.

This treaty was debated at the North Atlantic Assembly in Lisbon. The support we gave to it in resolution 83 reads as follows:

The Assembly . . .

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to support United States' efforts to conclude a SALT agreement which is equitable, balanced and verifiable;
2. to press that further negotiations seek to bring about significant reductions in each side's strategic nuclear forces;

I think everybody agreed with that.

3. to press that these subsequent negotiations include the theatre nuclear forces deployed in and against the European theatre.

But, if you are going to confine the range of a cruise missile to 600 kilometers, I repeat, you cannot hit one target in the Soviet Union because of the distance.

I know this is a matter, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, for American senators to decide whether it is or is not in their best interests to sign, but I suggest again that it is a subject matter which you and I should be concerned with as well.

Honourable senators, in conclusion I would just like to remind you of another fact. In the world today there are about 180 governments. There are 35 of those governments that could expect to be changed through the use of a ballot box. That is 35 out of 180. The balance will be changed either by a coup d'état or by passing from one dictator to another. If you look at the map of the world today you ought to be concerned when you see the trouble around us.

Sometimes I feel there is some significance with respect to the world movements today and those that happened back in 1938-39. There is a similarity. It is time that all of us paid more attention to world affairs. I do not believe that through treaty or détente the Soviet Union should be allowed to accomplish diplomatically what it has not been able to accomplish for three decades through the build-up of arms.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, we have just heard an excellent speech from Senator McDonald. It had not been my intention to comment at this time, but I believe one or two things he said call for immediate comment, and one in particular is his reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The chairman of that committee is not here. I happen to be the vice-chairman, but I speak only for myself when I say that I welcome his suggestion that the Foreign Affairs Committee should concern itself much more than it does with matters of national defence.

Senator McDonald has made the suggestion that the Senate might arrange by one way or another to have the whole question of national defence referred to that committee, or discussed in other ways within the procedures of the Senate. I feel that his first suggestion that it could well be handled within the structure of the Foreign Affairs Committee is a good one.

I say that for several reasons. One is that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs normally deals only with matters directly referred to it and, unfortunately, under our system—and I am not referring now to our Senate system but our parliamentary system—many matters that should automatically go before that committee do not.

I asked the Leader of the Government a question the other day as to whether a certain treaty, a certain agreement—it is called an agreement, but it is actually a treaty—would be referred to Parliament before ratification. In due course I have no doubt I will have an answer, and my guess is the answer will be no, in spite of a clear declaration by a former Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, that in future all treaties—all treaties, all agreements—would be referred to Parliament formally for approval. That means they are not merely placed on the table, but are approved by Parliament before they are ratified.

I said before that I think it is a disgraceful situation in this country that the executive, the government, can ratify a treaty, or an agreement, without referring it to the Parliament of Canada. But that happens to be our system under a stupid, old anachronism known as the prerogative of the Crown as exercised in this field.

It will be my intention, in consultation with others, not only on this side but on the other side as well, to move a resolution that this whole question be seriously discussed in the Senate, not merely on an inquiry but perhaps referred to a committee, so that we can inform the government as to the kind of policy that might make much better sense in the future with respect to entering into international obligations on behalf of all the citizens of Canada.

I assert again that no such obligation—no important one—should be entered into merely on the decision of the cabinet, as is the situation at the present time.

Senator McDonald has referred to the SALT agreement. He said the disposition of the negotiations leading up to the SALT agreement is one which may determine whether we have a third world war within a very few years, on even months. I am quoting Senator McDonald, and I agree with him entirely. That is certainly the feeling of many who are discussing the SALT agreement at the present time.

• (1530)

As Senator McDonald said, the United States government cannot enter into the SALT agreement without the approval of two-thirds of the Senate. The Canadian government can enter into it without consulting anybody, except itself. That is the situation we face, in spite of assurances given over the years by more than one Prime Minister that this situation would be changed. I suggest that this, in the imminent context of the SALT agreement, is a subject that we in this Senate should be far more concerned about than we have been in the past.

The question raised by Senator McDonald regarding the content of the SALT agreement is one which concerns everybody who is interested in world peace, specifically in the context of the attempt to preserve that world peace, at least for a little longer. There are those who are in support of the SALT agreement as it is now written, and there are those who feel that it would be a world tragedy if the SALT agreement, as written or prescribed, was accepted by what I will call, for the moment, the NATO countries, which include the United States and Canada.

I am no expert in this field, but I have read about the discussions which have taken place recently. My conclusion is the same as the one Senator McDonald came to—that is, that some weapon omissions in the treaty at the present time make it, if not largely ineffective, at least something which the Warsaw Pact countries would welcome, and that has been the case. They welcome it as it stands which, in my mind, is a good enough reason for taking a very hard look at it.

In light of the facts and figures Senator McDonald has given to us this afternoon, I am quite sure it is not an exaggeration to say we should be alarmed with the SALT agreement in its present form.

This raises the whole question of the structure of our role which tends to limit standing committees to the study of such references from time to time. The wording Senator McDonald read as applying to the Foreign Affairs Committee applies to all Senate committees. The Leader of the Government might give some consideration—not from a rules point of view but from a policy point of view—to taking a hard look at this to decide whether these committees, should be given authority to deal with the whole subject at any time according to the undertaking of the members of the committee, the steering committee and the chairman. It is my recollection that, very wisely, the Chairman of the Agriculture Committee sought this blanket authority. I think it might be well if all our committees were given similar blanket authority in respect to the specific subjects in their area of responsibility under the rules.

In the case of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, I believe it should be allowed to study treaties and international agreements. This is one item that should come before the Senate automatically, as it does in the United States and in other countries where there is a second chamber. That seems to be a natural function of the second chamber. They discuss, and even have the final say in, such agreements and treaties. External trade, foreign aid, defence, immigration—and this will surprise some honourable senators because I do not think that committee, since I have been a member of it, has ever discussed immigration—and territorial and off-shore matters which, of course, would take in the very important question of the law of the sea treaties, should be studied by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

I am sure that if this blanket responsibility were given to that committee and, perhaps to others, that it would then become an obligation on such committees to accept that responsibility, to look at the developments from day to day and decide on those issues. A committee such as that has a duty, a responsibility, to the Senate to examine national policy in these areas, and bring important aspects to the attention of the Senate.

I should like to thank Senator McDonald for bringing this matter to the fore in a very explicit way. He has made many first class contributions to our attempts to understand our defence policy in this chamber. I congratulate him on the fact that recently he, as a senator, accepted the chairmanship of the NATO Assembly group in the Parliament of Canada. I am sure he will carry out that duty with distinction. I welcome his initiative now to introduce the subject of defence into the deliberations of the Senate.

Senator Molgat: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Grosart: Yes.

Senator Molgat: I wonder if he could tell us, dealing with the matter of the ratification of treaties, what the practice has been in the United Kingdom?

Senator Grosart: It is from the so-called Westminster tradition that we have inherited what I have called this anachronism. In the United Kingdom they have made many modifications, without modifying the concept. They still hold to that concept of the prerogative of the Crown which arises, of course, from the historical circumstances surrounding the King of England going to war. At that time, if the King of England went to war, England did not necessarily go to war. Perhaps he went to war regarding his domains in Anjou or Germany, or he may have gone to war in the Near East on a crusade. This happened over and over again. The British people did not assume they were automatically at war because the King was at war. He only came before Parliament when he needed money, if he could not raise it in other ways.

That has persisted, but in both houses of the United Kingdom Parliament today there are serious debates on treaties and matters such as those raised by Senator McDonald, and in a much more regular and serious way than they are debated in the Parliament of Canada.

There are obvious reasons for that. Britain was the centre of a great empire and, with interests all around the world, it was natural that foreign affairs, treaties, and so forth, were of greater importance to the British Parliament than they were to the Canadian Parliament. However, this does not, in any way, change the suggestion I have made that the Canadian Parliament should automatically approve all important agreements and treaties.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

MR. RAYMOND BARRE

VISIT OF PREMIER OF FRENCH REPUBLIC

Senator Riel: With your leave, honourable senators, I would like to draw the attention of the Senate to the recent visit in our country of the Premier of the French Republic, Mr. Raymond Barre, and Mrs. Barre, a very successful visit which ended Tuesday night. I would also like to say on behalf of the Senate that the people of Canada were pleased to receive them.

Further, I would like to thank Mr. Barre for the courtesy visit he made to the Speaker of the Senate and also to congratulate him for the lesson of great dignity and sound political judgment he gave us during his stay. I think that, in the future, to the pithy expression "non-interference, non-indifference", we shall have to add the words "non-malevolence".

Mr. Barre not only showed himself as being the equal of President Lincoln in the spirit of "With malice toward none; with charity for all" but also, and at the same time, as being in the great tradition of his predecessors, Sully and Colbert. He is a man of quality.

Senator Flynn: I am prepared to support the words Senator Riel has just said. I like those historical reminders. I would say that those relating to the present are probably more certain and more accurate than those relating to the past.

Senator Riel: I do not know to which part of those reminders relating to the past you are addressing yourself in particular, but we shall have the opportunity to discuss this outside this chamber.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 20, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to give you a brief outline of the work schedule for next week. I will deal first with the committee meetings.

On Tuesday the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The National Finance Committee will meet at 2.30 p.m. to continue its examination of the estimates of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and at 3 o'clock the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee will hold its first meeting on the question of off-track betting in Canada. It will then resume its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-9, the Canada Referendum Act. As announced earlier, the Agriculture Committee will meet at 8.30 p.m.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has scheduled a meeting at 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-37, the Income Tax Amendment Act, and at 2.30 p.m. the committee will deal with the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act.

On Thursday the National Finance Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. to continue its study of the DREE estimates. The Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline will also meet at 9.30, as will the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to continue its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-15. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11.00 a.m.

In the Senate we will deal with the items on the order paper, and I expect that there will be a new bill for introduction in the Senate early in the week.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he will be able to give us in the next few days a report of the proceedings of the endeavour, which was recently terminated, to renegotiate the international wheat agreement. The news report today is that no agreement has been reached. I would be interested in knowing what the position of the Canadian delegation was with respect to those aborted negotiations.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will be pleased to inquire into this matter.

ENERGY

SUPPLY OF CRUDE OIL TO IMPERIAL OIL REFINERIES IN CANADA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday a question was asked on the subject of Imperial Oil refineries by the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester). The question, which appears at page 542 of the Debates of the Senate, reads:

Could the Leader of the Government inform the Senate whether it is true that the parent company of Imperial Oil Limited has either announced that it is about to cut, or has in fact cut, the supply of crude oil to the Imperial Oil refineries in Canada, and particularly to the company's refinery in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia?

I can report that this subject has been a matter of substantial discussion among government officials and ministers in recent hours, indeed until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

I hope to have a statement provided to me shortly. This is regarded as a very important issue, as Senator Smith (Colchester) suggested yesterday. A great deal of work has been done on the question over the past few hours.

[Senator Langlois.]

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, in asking the Leader of the Government a supplementary question, I would remind him that in 1973, after the last oil crisis, a body called the International Energy Agency was established in which consuming countries around the world took out membership. Is Canada a member of the International Energy Agency?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that information will be provided in the reply which I hope we can present to the house very shortly.

There is a determination on the part of the government that no unilateral action of the kind which has been given so much publicity in recent hours shall be tolerated without a firm response by the Government of Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we would probably agree with that sentiment, but I would be interested to know just what obligations the Government of Canada assumed when it joined the International Energy Agency, as I assume it did, and what the rules are, and what bearing those rules have on this present problem.

NEWFOUNDLAND—POWER POTENTIAL OF LOWER CHURCHILL FALLS—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question that is supplementary to those concerning the impending crisis in oil supplies to eastern Canada.

While the leader is extracting the information sought by honourable senators, I wonder if he would get an up-to-date report on any consultations going on between the federal government and the Province of Newfoundland about developing the vast potential of energy from the Lower Churchill Falls, which would supply much of the energy needs of eastern Canada and the rest of the country.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, an inquiry will go forward on that matter.

AIR CANADA

STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT REGARDING SALE TO PRIVATE INTERESTS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked yesterday by Senator Marchand about the possibility of selling a part interest in Air Canada to the private sector.

I am now able to inform honourable senators that Air Canada has supplied some information on the statement attributed to Claude Taylor.

In a recent interview with Canadian Press, Air Canada President, Claude Taylor, did suggest that the government may want to sell a part interest in the airline to the private sector.

This could be considered in the next five years, if Air Canada maintains a proper financial return over this term. The airline has recorded after-tax profits of $20 million and $47 million in the last two years.

Mr. Taylor pointed out that when the Air Canada Act was before Parliament, Transport Minister Otto Lang indicated a willingness to consider putting some of Air Canada's stock up for sale provided the airline showed it could consistently show a profit.

The airline president suggested that if and when the government considered the idea, it could begin by offering a block of shares to Air Canada employees.

In the interview, Mr. Taylor stressed that the $3 billion required to finance aircraft over the next 10 years will be raised on international money markets—without government assistance.

THE SENATE

REMARKS BY NDP LEADER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege concerning remarks made earlier this week by the leader of the New Democratic Party, Mr. Broadbent, about the future of this chamber.

I think those remarks were awesome in their ignorance about the function of this chamber and its role in Canadian society. On December 14 last, when addressing the house during the debate on the consideration of the first report of the Standing Committee of the Senate on the Constitution, I described the substantive purpose of this chamber, but the NDP has never made a substantive reply.

Mr. Broadbent spoke about this chamber being a gymnasium. Perhaps the NDP needs to be taught how vigorous we are. Therefore, on behalf of Senator Frith, Senator Roblin and myself, I issue a challenge to Mr. Broadbent and the members of his NDP caucus to a round robin squash tournament at any time in the next few weeks.

INTERNATIONAL OIL SUPPLY—MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have just been handed a copy of a statement which is now being made in the other place by the Honourable Alastair Gillespie. I feel that it is an important statement and, with the indulgence of this house, I propose to read it:

In recent days I have answered a number of questions in the House of Commons and made other public statements relative to the Iranian oil situation.

This paper provides an update on the current situation and background on developments relating to it.

The International Situation: The world has been without significant Iranian oil exports for nearly two months. The shut-down of exports on December 26 followed a period of disruption to shipments between late October and early December.

Production has been increased in a number of other exporting countries, partly offsetting the loss of Iranian oil. We estimate the net loss of Iranian oil at about 5 per cent of the non-communist world's supply.

I think we should note that increases in some countries have brought their production above politically dictated ceilings. We should note too that, with Iran out of action, the global system is operating at capacity with nothing in hand to cope with possible disruption of order sources, however caused.

On a world scale, the net loss of Iranian supply is being met by an accelerated drawdown of inventories. Global stocks, normally equivalent to perhaps 80 days supply, are falling at a rate of three to five days a quarter. This stock draw will have to be reversed and inventories replaced if next winter's requirements are going to be adequately met.

The international oil supply situation is therefore serious, but not critical. The International Energy Agency, in which Canada plays an active role, is consulting with the oil industry, preparing comprehensive appraisals and providing an important forum for discussion between participating countries. The governing board of the agency will next meet in early March, to undertake a comprehensive, senior-level review. We are consulting the provinces as to Canada's position at this meeting.

The minister goes on to say:

I do not expect that the agency's emergency oil sharing system will be activated at this time: the global shortfall is still significantly less than the 7 per cent loss of supply which would trigger the sharing system. Of course, if there were to be further disruption of overseas supply while Iranian exports remain shut down, the loss could reach or exceed 7 per cent. In this case, Canada would fulfil its commitments to restrain demand, or take equivalent measures, and would take part in the international reallocation of supply.

Oil Supply in Canada: Imports still account for nearly 30 per cent of our oil supply and Iran was our third largest foreign supplier, after Venezuela and Saudi Arabia. In normal circumstances, we would have expected to receive about 100,000 barrels a day of Iranian crude in early 1979.

Of course, our dependence on overseas oil would have been much greater had the government not acted vigorously after the 1973-74 crisis to establish a secure flow of western Canadian oil to eastern Canada.

The interprovincial pipeline system was extended to Montreal in 1976 on the strength of government guarantees of financing and market; the government has subsidized the tariff differential between Toronto and Montreal; and we have strongly encouraged maximum use of the line. As a result, our direct import dependency has been cut from 800,000 barrels a day to 500,000 and 60 per cent of Quebec's oil supply is now met from secure Canadian sources.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault:

Of our 500,000 barrels daily of imports, about 200,000 come from Venezuela, a source which has proved completely reliable in peace and war for many decades. The balance is imported mostly from the Middle East, and this is worrisome.

Canadian importers who have been affected directly or indirectly by the Iranian situation have had some success in obtaining alternative sources. As well, maximum quantities of western oil are being shipped east. The pipeline systems doing this are working at capacity. But some shortfall remains to be made up.

A month ago, therefore, I authorized the National Energy Board to deal with applications for the exchange of additional quantities of western Canadian oil delivered to United States refiners for supplemental supplies of overseas crude made available by those refiners to our companies in eastern Canada. Nearly one and a half million barrels of exchange oil have already arrived in the east and the board has approved or signified approval in principle for the exchange of a further 2.2 million barrels in the first quarter of the year. This rate of exchange, nearly 40,000 barrels a day over the quarter, will enable product supplies to be maintained to Canadian consumers without requiring an accelerated stock draw. Nevertheless, unforeseen developments such as the Gulf refinery fire at Montreal earlier this week could give rise to problems in respect of particular grades of product.

This support from western Canada is invaluable. I would like to express the federal government's appreciation to the Government of Alberta which, with its agencies, is co-operating fully to facilitate both the maximum delivery of Canadian oil by pipeline to the last and the exchange process.

"Reallocation" of Overseas Oil Supplies: There have been reports that, as a result of reallocation of supplies by multinational companies, deliveries to Canadian importers from overseas sources other than Iran have been cut back.

Specifically, it is reported that the Exxon Corporation has diverted to other markets 25,000 barrels a day of Venezuelan crude that would have been imported by Imperial Oil.

The President of Imperial Oil, Mr. Jack Armstrong, has advised me that Imperial is not prepared to accept the reallocation system proposed by its supplier Exxon. Mr. Armstrong has assured me that Imperial can meet its first quarter oil product commitments without further exchanges of Canadian oil. However, this will involve some drawdown of inventories. To secure its product supply in the second quarter, Imperial will have to make some progress in its on-going discussions with Exxon.

I have told Mr. Armstrong that the diversion of Venezuelan oil by the Exxon Corporation is not acceptable to the Government of Canada. I expect the management of Imperial Oil to bend every effort to ensure that this supply is totally restored to Canadian use.

Arrangements for the Import of Venezuelan and Mexican Oil: When I visited Venezuela last month, the authorities there clearly expressed their desire and readiness to supply oil directly to Canada for refining by Imperial, without going through the Exxon group. A direct commercial relationship of this kind has already been established by another Canadian refiner and is working to the satisfaction of both parties.

Given the willingness of the Venezuelans to enter into such a direct relationship, I can see no reason why Venezuelan oil should be diverted away from Canada by a multinational intermediary.

I have therefore formally requested the President of Imperial Oil to establish a direct contractual relationship with Venezuela at the earliest opportunity.

Such a relationship would give practical effect to the desires of the Venezuelan authorities and would ensure that this flow of secure oil is not subject to reallocation in an emergency by the Exxon group to meet its own supply shortfalls.

In this connection I believe that, as a matter of policy, Canadian companies should as far as possible give preference to western hemisphere supplies and should source this oil directly.

The head of Petro-Ven, Venezuela's national oil company, has indicated to me that his company is prepared to make available 200,000 barrels a day of light and medium crude oils for the indefinite future. As well, we are negotiating arrangements which will lead to the import of 100,000 barrels a day of Mexican crude by the end of next year. By sourcing 60 per cent of our imports from these countries and by acquiring this oil under direct contract arrangements with the primary suppliers, we can significantly improve the security of our total oil supply.

• (1430)

Senator Smith (Colchester): I certainly thank the Leader of the Government for the detailed explanation he has given. In view of his willingness to give such detail, I am reluctant to trouble him about another point I raised yesterday which seems to me not to have been dealt with, but which perhaps has been and I have not caught the implication.

One of the questions I asked yesterday was directed towards ascertaining whether the quantity of refined products of the eastern Canada refineries, particularly those of the Imperial Oil refinery at Dartmouth, would be reduced as a result of this difficulty about diversion of oil from Venezuela by Exxon, and, if so, by how much?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in view of the expressed determination of the minister on behalf of the government that there will be no cutback in the deliveries of oil to eastern Canada, and that appropriate measures will be taken, it can be presumed that the possible difficulty anticipated by Senator Smith will not occur. However, further information will be sought.

UNITED STATES—CRUDE OIL INVENTORIES—QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, referring again to the statement that the government leader has just made on the subject of oil supplies, I would like to say that we have kept some shut-in capacity in oil in order to protect our domestic supplies, and the effect of increasing our production in Alberta so as to use that surplus capacity has been to give an opportunity to international oil companies to divert oil to other countries, thereby bringing into play our surplus capacity to assist in the international supply distribution. But the key difficulty is that the more capacity we use to replace international imports, the less capacity we have to assist the United States in its own crisis.

With that background I should like to ask the government leader whether the government has any information on inventories of crude oil in the United States, which I understand are well below normal levels at this time. Some people have said that the United States is being caught with its international crude oil supply down. The difficulty with that—and this is the information I seek from the government leader—is whether the United States has any method of building up its inventories before the winter of 1979-80, or whether indeed the United States will face rather severe oil shortages in that winter and be looking to us to help make up those shortages at a time when companies like Exxon are using our excess production, or our shut-in capacity, to divert fuel in their own marketing system.

I have one final question. Is the government leader aware that Imperial Oil is 70 per cent owned by Exxon?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, because of its complex nature, the question will be taken as notice. The government is aware of the relationship between Imperial Oil and Exxon. It is an interesting relationship under these present circumstances.

Senator Flynn: I think you should also thank Senator Austin for all the information he has given you.

Senator Perrault: Once again I think we should all feel gratified that there is such a great and detailed fund of knowledge in the Senate.

Senator Austin: And we are good squash players, too!

Senator Flynn: Of that I have no doubt.

Senator Roblin: I have to respond to that last remark. If there are any here who do not know the quality of the squash playing in the Senate, I should be glad to enlighten them. I would also point out that at the moment I am the current champ.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the alleged diversion of oil by Exxon from Canada to other places lend strength to the Honourable Walter Gordon's theory that we should have control of our own economic destiny?

Senator Flynn: That is the ideal, of course.

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask what I suppose could be called a supplementary question relating to energy. The Leader of the Government in his comprehensive statement made reference to the International Energy Agency. I should like to direct this question to him: Is the allegation true that the Government of Canada maintains that this agency allocation scheme, which is not yet in effect, is not likely to be in effect this winter?

Senator Perrault: I am in no position, honourable senators, to provide a detailed estimate on that particular eventuality, but the question will be directed to the minister responsible for this particular agency.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

DISCOUNTING AND ALLOWANCES IN THE FOOD INDUSTRY—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government in the Senate aware of an assertion made by the President of the Ontario Agricultural Association to the effect that food-store chains engage in a practice of taking rebates from their suppliers, a practice that would be considered illegal in most countries? If that assertion is based on fact, will he inform this house in due course as to what the government intends to do about such a matter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the matter has been discussed with the Honourable Warren Allmand, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and the question raised at the hearings yesterday is under study.

Senator Bosa: What action is proposed?

Senator Perrault: No action has been formulated as yet. As I understand it, there was a body of testimony provided yesterday before a provincial royal commission by a representative of the Ontario agricultural industry. However, without a complete transcript being available, and without opposition arguments being heard, I think it would be inappropriate for the government to react immediately to a statement which may call for further clarification.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 8 the debate on the consideration of the First Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution.

[Translation]

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I do not intend to go on for too long as I was warned yesterday by my friend, Senator Grosart, that he would check his watch and limit my speech to ten minutes. Still I want to talk about the Canadian Constitution. Some may suggest that everything has already been said on this matter; all sorts of opinions, which are not necessarily in agreement, have been expressed about the Constitution, and we can conclude that everything has been said. I cannot therefore pretend this afternoon that I can come up with new ideas, because this debate has been going on since 1867. However, this debate has grown in importance, especially from 1927 until February 15, 1979, when it assumed great proportions.

Yesterday I met my friend Senator Manning in the Senate. I would like here to speak about a personal experience related to this issue. From the sixties on, I took part in the constitutional debates during every conference held when I was Attorney General and Premier of my province, just like Senator Manning. Around 1960 or 1961, under the Diefenbaker administration, we seemed to have found a formula to patriate the Constitution. This was the Fulton formula. At that time, the Honourable Davie Fulton was Minister of Justice in the Diefenbaker government. This formula made no impact, or rather it made some, but it was shelved because of the objections of one or two provinces, especially Quebec. In 1964, and I remember this as if it were yesterday, during a constitutional meeting of the provincial attorneys general which coincided with a meeting of the premiers, Senator Manning and I, each of us holding the two positions, attended a meeting of the attorneys general. The Honourable Guy Favreau was Minister of Justice at that time. A formula was suggested, and this was the Fulton-Favreau formula. Whether it was Favreau-Fulton or Fulton-Favreau has absolutely no significance. All attorneys general agreed—and I did say all of them—on the Fulton-Favreau formula in 1964. I recall very well that at that time, the Honourable Paul Gérin-Lajoie, who was Minister of Youth in the Lesage government, was the constitutional expert in Quebec. He had come to an agreement with us. Around four o'clock in the afternoon, Senator Manning and I left the meeting of the attorneys general to go to the premiers' conference and to announce the good news.

Finally we had come to an agreement, and finally we were to patriate the Constitution. Premiers from the other provinces and the Prime Minister were quite happy. Finally we had an agreement. The eleven first ministers had reached immediate agreement on the Fulton-Favreau formula. Two days later, the headlines were that the Province of Quebec was backing out from the agreement struck between attorneys general and first ministers. The whole Fulton-Favreau formula was going down the drain.

There were other conferences on the matter. There was the Victoria Charter in 1971. There have been conferences since. There has been study on the constitutional problem, but then no agreement is ever forthcoming. So I wonder if there is not an over-emphasis on the Constitution as such, or whether we are serious when studying the concepts in the Constitution. I wonder. Perhaps the Senate could answer that question, as it has a number of other questions.

[Senator Robichaud.]

Turning now to the Pepin-Robarts report, one of the studies on the Constitution. Of course, I am in total disagreement with many of its recommendations. I would, however, quote from the document "A Future Together" on the work done by the task force. It had this to say:

Sometimes the country seemed to us to be composed of a multiplicity of solitudes, islands of self-contained activity and discourse disconnected from their neighbours and tragically unaware of the whole which contained them all. When one spoke, the others did not listen; indeed, they barely seemed to hear. Canadians live in a big, empty land but they congregate in vital, often boisterously energetic communities. Why is it that we have not learned better to employ this century's communications technology to talk together across the empty spaces?

On we go along that road. There is another paragraph I would like to quote, if I had the time.

I feel that some conclusions in the Pepin-Robarts report are pessimistic. Of course, there are differences in Canada. We have different religions, different languages, different cultures, but there could be agreement on common goals. There is agreement far oftener than disagreement. I do not get really upset when a federal-provincial conference is said to be a failure, because it depends mostly on what the journalists want to say about it. That does not impress me very much, just as long as Canada remains Canada A mari usque ad mare. In addition, there are, of course, internal quarrels within the Canadian family, just as there are in ordinary families. However, when there is a problem that concerns everyone, we all pull together. A mari usque ad mare.

Well, I saw it happen—though this may seem somewhat ridiculous to some—when in 1972 the hockey series was played in Moscow between Canada and Russia. I was there, along with some 3,000 other Canadians. What did Canada want? Victory. During the eighth game, at the end of the second period, Canada, or the National Hockey League—though we said "Canada" because we were all Canadians—was losing 5 to 3 to the Russians. We just had to win that game. Phil Esposito scored about half-way during the third period, making it 5 to 4. At one minute and 34 seconds, Yvan Cournoyer evened the score, 5 to 5. And 34 seconds before the end, Paul Henderson scored the final goal.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Senator Robichaud: We won the series. But all the Canadians who were there, whether they came from Jonquière, Kénogami, the Gaspé Peninsula, Prince Rupert in British Columbia, or Winnipeg, all of them there were embracing each other because Canada had won. During the last series, whether Guy Lafleur or Darryl Sittler scored made no difference. One thing only mattered: that Canada should win. We were all part of one big family.

So when there are great goals to achieve, Canada can stick together, despite the temporary accident that occurred on November 15, 1976, in Quebec.

Now, with regard to internal quarrels, they occur because there are extremists on both sides. I have been reading a book called Bilingual Today, French Tomorrow, sent to me by a Toronto publisher.

[English]

I read that book with disgust. After having read it I phoned the publisher in Toronto and asked for the address of the author. I wanted to talk with him because I had made notes of the fundamental basic errors that were contained in the book. The publisher told me, "I am sorry, he cannot be reached. He is in Spain." I said, "Well, I hope he stays in Spain, because he is not a good Canadian. Yet you sent me that book through our postal service. I read it, and I am disgusted both with the author and with the publisher." I then gave the reasons why I was disgusted.

● (1450)

That is one side of the story, and more people could be included in that category. They are the extremists.

On the other side—let us say, on the francophone side—there are extremists also. I cannot condone all that is contained in Bill 101 in the Province of Quebec, for instance, because I believe in the protection of minority rights in this country. One of the objectives of the Fathers of Confederation was that the Constitution would protect minority rights throughout the country.

[Translation]

Now that is where the Pepin-Robarts Task Force and I part company—when it recommends giving the provinces full and complete jurisdiction over language rights. I believe this right should be enshrined in a confederative pact, not a new Constitution but a revised Constitution reflecting the problems of 1979 rather than 1867—revised but not entirely dismantled to come up with Bill C-60, for example. I am going to try to come back to Bill C-60.

Some Hon. Senators: Go on, go on, it is very interesting.

Senator Robichaud: Linguistic rights—here I represent perhaps not a region but I am aware that I represent my province, the Province of New Brunswick.

Right now the Province of New Brunswick is the only one in Canada giving both languages equal rights. It is officially bilingual. That is fortunate because today we have a government which has followed the policies of the previous administration.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Robichaud: But what could happen in 10 or 15 years? I do not know. I would not want to see a repetition of what happened in 1871 in Manitoba, or a repetition of Bill 101 in Quebec. But then the linguistic rights of minorities would have to be enshrined in a revised Constitution.

What gave rise in my own province to what is called the Acadian party? Again, internal quarrels. The Acadian party has absolutely no reason for being here. I said many times, and I repeat to those who are Acadians and really want to serve their cause, why not work through the existing political structures instead of founding an Acadian party? If there is an Acadian party, why not a Loyalist party? If there is an Acadian party and a Loyalist party, why not an Italian party? And, if there is an Acadian party, a Loyalist party, an Italian party, why not a Scottish party, an Irish party? So you end up with utter chaos. We now have in this country structures we can be proud of and, to those who say that it is terrible in Canada, I say how lucky we are to live in this country.

● (1500)

[English]

When we compare ourselves with other countries, such as Iran and Pakistan, which want to get rid of some of their fundamental institutions, and some of the countries of South America and even the United States, do we not consider ourselves lucky to live in Canada despite certain little discussions—not battles, but discussions—that take place regularly? We should be proud of being Canadians, and proud of our institutions that make it possible for all Canadians to live a decent life. Some people may call us socialistic because we have family allowances, unemployment insurance, medical care, and so on. Perhaps we are on the socialistic side. So what? Everybody is happy with that, and no one suffers or dies from malnutrition or from lack of medical care in our country.

Perhaps we should debate the Constitution, but the Constitution as it presently stands has made us proud to be Canadians, and to be called Canadians.

I should like now to discuss Bill C-60 and the recommendation of the Pepin-Robarts task force. I would like to have time to deal with the monarchy, human rights and the Supreme Court, but I will touch on only one subject, and that is the task force's recommendation as to what should happen to the Senate.

I knew the co-chairman of that task force, Jean Luc Pepin, when he was a minister here and I was the Premier of New Brunswick, and I have known John Robarts for nine years. To me their recommendation to abolish the Senate and create a house of 60—60 what?—supported by the provinces, is asinine. It is absolute nonsense. I think that is even worse than the suggestions contained in Bill C-60 with respect to the Senate. It was said that the provisions in Bill C-60 would create an institution with revolving doors—people coming and going. That is also nonsense.

Perhaps some adjustments should be made to the Senate, but we can make those adjustments ourselves. For 112 years this institution has served a great cause, and it is going to continue to serve a great cause—the cause of Canada. Certain adjustments can be made from within. Possibly there should be more senators representing the western provinces. I would not object to that one bit. But the institution, as I have known it for 53 years, and as Canada has known it for 112 years, should remain basically intact. I have maintained that position since last summer when the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution commenced its study. I am willing to repeat it in Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver, Trois Rivières, Percé and Moncton.

Perhaps something else can be done by the Senate. Back in November I asked how many royal commissions, commissions of inquiry and task forces existed at that moment across Canada at the federal and provincial levels. I received in answer a long list of all the royal commissions, commissions of inquiry and task forces which were studying an almost unbelievable number and variety of subjects. It is my belief that we have in this chamber experts who could look into these problems—perhaps not all of them, but many of them—that are being studied throughout Canada by so-called experts who need to call experts as witnesses before them.

Cannot the Senate do this? We have experts in a variety of fields here. In the area of agriculture we have Senator Hazen Argue; in the area of finance we have Senator Molson, Senator Hayden and others; and Senator Williams and Senator Adams are experts in the area of Indian affairs.

Senator Asselin: And Senator Perrault.

Senator Robichaud: Yes, I could go on. In the area of constitutional affairs we have Senator Asselin and Senator Flynn. We also have the expertise of Senator Godfrey. We have the expertise in this chamber. We are as capable of calling witnesses as anyone else, and such studies, when undertaken by the Senate, are less expensive. These royal commissions are costing the taxpayers of Canada millions of dollars.

Following my study, the Financial Post, on November 25, 1978, reported that there were nine royal commissions and commissions of inquiry currently in operation at the federal level alone. At the provincial level there were 21 commissions of inquiry working away—presumably assiduously. That is the total number. I would venture to say that half of these would not have been appointed had the expertise that can be provided by the Senate of Canada been sought.

● (1510)

I have other things to say, but I have gone beyond my time limit. I simply want to reiterate two points. My opinion is that linguistic rights should be entrenched in a revised Constitution. It is also my view that those who want to modify the institution of the Senate are much more temporary. This institution is permanent and should remain permanent. The others can come and go, but the institution of the Senate should remain.

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 20, at 8 p.m.

BEEF IMPORT BILL

FIRST READING

Senator Sparrow presented Bill S-13, to control the importation of beef into Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Sparrow moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS

Senator Marshall: I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether members of the Senate are receiving all the information, all documents and all petitions, that are directed to the members of the Parliament of Canada, because it appears to me that there are many documents that are not being received by members of the Parliament of Canada and, indeed, by senators. Regardless of the fact that I am out of order, I bring that to the attention of the chamber.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

DISTRIBUTION OF REPORT—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I rise to ask the Leader of the Government if he can make some inquiries into a recent achievement of the practical joke department of the government.

Senator Flynn: What is the other name of the department?

Senator Forsey: I leave that to the wisdom of the Honourable Senator Flynn to define. Some 10 days ago I received a letter or an inquiry by telephone—I can't recall which—from the National Unity office or the task force report people—someone responsible, anyhow—asking how many extra copies of the report of the Pepin-Robarts task force I should like. I considered the matter—"I deliberated upon it," as Sir Robert Borden would have said—and I replied "Twenty-five." What was my astonishment Friday morning to find in my office an enormous carton containing no less than 80 copies.

I suppose this inquiry has a somewhat frivolous air, but it seems to me that this is a ridiculous situation and a waste of public money. If the computer—and I suppose it was responsible—was going to spew out 80 copies of this document, this priceless and ineffable document, to every member of the House of Commons and the Senate, as I understand happened, well, all right; but why ask us how many we want? If we are going to be asked how many we want, why not pay some attention to what we say in reply?

It reminds me of the time when the Canadian Pacific Railway sent up a large piece of freight to myself and my wife in Montreal and called up and said "Where would you like it sent"? We said, "Apartment 36, 424 Sherbrooke Street, West Montreal." The next word we had was "It's gone to Fredericton."

Evidently the practical joke department has taken a leaf out of the practice of the CPR many years ago in Montreal, and having been told that I wanted 25 copies, it showered upon me this undesired largesse of 80. I am informed that this has happened to many, if not all, of the members of this house and probably the House of Commons, and it seems to me a minor but most scandalous waste of public money; and I should be greatly pleased if the Leader of the Government could look into the matter and find out what is going on.

Senator Riley: I received 750 copies.

Senator Flynn: Probably because they didn't ask you how many you wanted.

An Hon. Senator: I said that I didn't want any, but I still got my 80 copies.

● (2015)

Senator Perrault: At least there is one heartening aspect of the honourable senator's observations. At frequent intervals some senators complain that they do not receive sufficient documentation. Now we appear to have this embarrassment of documentary riches showering down upon us. And then there is the possibility, honourable senators, that some other angry individuals in the environs of Ottawa may have ordered 80 copies and received only 25.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS

PATRIATION OF THE CONSTITUTION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Olson a few days ago regarding the patriation of the Constitution and the amending formula. The question was as follows:

Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether or not the federal government has made up its mind as to what to do in response to the suggestions by at least one province, and perhaps more, that Parliament should go ahead and patriate the Constitution without amendment.

First of all, honourable senators, I can say again that there was no consensus among the governments.

Ontario wished patriation with or without an amending formula soon, and Alberta, New Brunswick and British Columbia indicated that they might support this.

Saskatchewan and Quebec strongly linked the question to their positions on a modified distribution of powers.

NATURAL RESOURCES REVENUE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Olson asked a further question, as follows:

What was the federal government's stand in the constitutional meetings respecting natural resources revenue, and what, indeed, was offered to the provinces and what was expected in exchange for natural resources revenue and management of them?

1. The federal government has discussed with the provinces possible constitutional provisions concerning non-renewable resources, forestry resources, and electrical generation which would:

(a) affirm the exclusive powers of the provinces with respect to exploration, development, conservation, management, et cetera, of these resources;

(b) confer a power on the provinces to impose indirect taxation on primary products from these resources, even though such products are to be exported to other provinces or other countries. Provinces can now only impose direct taxes within the province;

(c) confer a concurrent power on provinces to regulate the export of such products, subject to trade and commerce laws made by Parliament which would always be paramount, in case of exports abroad, or which would be paramount only where they would serve a "compelling national interest" in case of interprovincial trade. Provinces now cannot regulate export as such, even where there is no federal law covering the situation, because Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over the regulation of interprovincial and international trade and commerce.

2. This discussion is part of an ongoing review of many aspects of the Constitution during which the federal government is or will be seeking certain changes and various provinces are or will be seeking other changes.

EQUALIZATION FORMULA—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin asked a question on the subject of equalization. He said:

Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government to provide the same kind of information with respect to the subject of equalization. That is a subject which came up at the conference with a view to entrenching it in the Constitution. Perhaps the leader could inform us as to whether a specific equalization formula was mentioned or whether it was simply a statement of the principle.

Honourable senators, the answer is as follows. The honourable senator will be aware that the Canadian Intergovernmental Conference Secretariat released last week some documents relating to the constitutional proposals discussed by first ministers at their conference on February 5 and 6. One of these documents relates to equalization and regional development. The proposal would be for a new section 96(1). This section would commit Parliament and the Government of Canada to the principle of making equalization payments to the provinces that are unable to provide essential public services of reasonable quality without imposing an undue burden on taxation.

The honourable senator will no doubt be aware that this proposal has obtained the support of the federal government and the governments of all provinces except that of British Columbia. The Government of British Columbia continues to have some minor reservations in that, while it is prepared to support the enshrinement of the principle of equalization, it is not prepared to see the means of achieving this principle embodied in the revised Constitution. We are of the view that the current proposal meets fully British Columbia's concern. We are hopeful that, when the constitutional discussions resume, the proposal relating to equalization will obtain unanimous support.

JURISDICTION OVER FAMILY LAW—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Senator Forsey asked a question on the subject of family law, as follows:

Honourable senators, I might ask the Leader of the Government whether, in view of the reported agreement on transferring jurisdiction over family law—which, I presume, means at least over marriage and divorce—from the Parliament of Canada to the legislatures of the provinces, the government is contemplating placing before both houses an Address asking for the necessary amendment to the British North America Act.

● (2020)

In summary, what was agreed to at the recent Constitutional Conference with respect to family law was that:

(1) legislative jurisdiction over marriage should be transferred to the provinces;

(2) legislative jurisdiction over divorce grounds be concurrent with provincial paramountcy;

(3) Parliament should have exclusive legislative jurisdiction over recognition of divorce and the jurisdictional basis upon which courts grant decrees;

(4) provinces be given power to confer upon provincially appointed judges jurisdiction in all family law matters.

I might add with respect to jurisdiction over divorce that there is a considerable difference of opinion amongst provinces as to where the legislative power over the substantive law of divorce should reside. The proposal of concurrency with provincial paramountcy provides flexibility by allowing those provinces who wish to enact their own divorce laws to do so, while, for those provinces who do not wish to exercise that power, the federal Divorce Act would remain in force. Retention of federal jurisdiction over recognition of divorce ensures Canada-wide recognition of divorces wherever they are granted in Canada.

Finally, in reply to the main point in Senator Forsey's question, I can say that the question of how best to proceed with respect to constitutional amendment relating to family law is currently under active consideration by the government.

Honourable senators, two documents have been provided with respect to the recent First Ministers' Conference on the Constitution. They are of such length that it is not possible to read them nor it be desirable to do so under these circumstances. However, I am quite willing to table them. The first document is entitled, "The List of Best Effort Draft Proposals with a Joint Government Input Discussed by First Ministers." The second document, entitled "Federal Draft Proposals Discussed by First Ministers," deals with Communications, Off-shore Resources, and Charter of Rights.

Senator Flynn: Prepared by whom?

Senator Perrault: These documents were prepared principally by federal authorities—draft proposals discussed by the First Ministers in their consultations.

Senator Flynn: Prepared by the Federal-Provincial Relations Office?

Senator Perrault: Like all efforts of this kind it is a co-operative endeavour. I cannot tell the exact authors of the documents. The documentation is the result of diligent work on the part of people at both federal and provincial levels.

Senator Croll: The secretariat.

Senator Perrault: Yes, the secretariat was very much involved. As I say, these are documents that I would be pleased to table.

An Hon. Senator: Or they could be printed as appendixes to today's Hansard.

Senator Perrault: Yes, we could make them part of today's Hansard, whichever course honourable senators desire.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that these documents shall form part of today's proceedings?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[For text of documents, see appendixes "A" and "B", pp. 579 to 591.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have some further replies that I should like to give this evening, but there may be some other verbal questions which honourable senators would like to put at this time.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government whether the document he referred to on the equalization proposition is included in the documents that he agreed to make part of today's proceedings? If it is not, could it also be included?

Senator Perrault: Equalization is mentioned in the documentation.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I am speaking now of the one the leader mentioned a few moments ago when he spoke of equalization specifically.

Senator Perrault: Those words, of course, will appear in today's record. They constitute an official reply given on behalf of the government. But included in the documentation there is material with respect to the subject of equalization.

PARLIAMENT

SUPPLY OF INFORMATION TO SENATORS—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, evidently I was not aware of the proper approach when I was ignored in the point of order I brought up earlier. But with respect to our order of business—Presentation of Petitions, Reading of Petitions, Reports of Committees, Notice of Inquiries, Notices of Motions—it is obvious to me from my experience in the other place that there is a lot of information that is not coming to me as a member of the Senate, and I refer particularly in one instance to the Canada Works Program.

Despite the fact that I am trying to represent people in the district that I represented when I was a member of the House of Commons, I am not receiving information that is directed to members of Parliament in the other place. I would suggest that those responsible for sending out information are remiss in their duties. I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if the matter could be investigated, because certainly if the information is not forthcoming to all members of Parliament—and I think we can be classified in that way—then there may be some delinquency on the part of those sending out the information. I would repeat my request that, the leader cause an investigation of the matter to ensure that I, as a member of Parliament, receive all information going out to members of Parliament in the other place.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I know of no occasion when information has been denied to members of this house when that information has been requested. All of the main documents of the government are tabled in this chamber. Additionally, I note that Senator Marshall has over 40 written questions on the order paper. I commend him for his diligence. It is an additional method of obtaining information. It is certainly the intention to have those questions answered for the senator's elucidation if not to his entire satisfaction.

If there are occasions when senators feel they are not obtaining information to which they feel entitled, I hope they bring that fact immediately to the attention of the leader's office.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Smith (Colchester) posed a question on February 15 on the subject of the International Energy Agency. Senator Smith asked whether it was true that the Government of Canada "maintains that this agency allocation scheme, which is not yet in effect, is not likely to be in effect this winter?"

The honourable senator was correct in his understanding. The Government of Canada does not expect that the emergency oil sharing system provided under the agreement on an international energy program will be activated this winter. However, the governing board of the International Energy Agency is meeting on March 1 and 2 to review the current situation in the oil market and to assess what action, if any, is necessary. It would not be prudent to anticipate the outcome of this aspect of the governing board's deliberations.

UNITED STATES—CRUDE OIL INVENTORIES—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Smith (Colchester) also asked a question about the oil supply situation for the Imperial Oil refinery in Dartmouth. I have just been provided with some further information on that.

A prolonged interruption of crude supply will, in the absence of compensating factors, result in an erosion of crude oil and petroleum product inventories and eventually show up in market shortages. While all the data with respect to the impact of the Iranian situation upon Canada is not yet available, we do not now appear to be in a critical position with regard to product supplies. The exchanges authorized to date by the National Energy Board will supplement eastern Canadian supplies by about 40,000 barrels per day in the first quarter. In addition, some oil companies have successfully procured replacement cargoes for lost Iranian crude. These measures should make up for a large portion, if not all, of the offshore petroleum lost as a result of the Iranian situation. It should also be noted that assurances have been received from Imperial that it can meet its first quarter product commitments, including those supplied by its Dartmouth refinery.

● (2030)

A recent review of product inventories in eastern Canada indicated that while they are somewhat lower than at the same time last year, they are still at manageable levels. Nevertheless, unusual or unforeseen problems, such as the recent fire at Gulf's Montreal refinery, can create sporadic difficulties and departmental officials are in close contact with the oil companies and are monitoring the product supply/demand situation closely. A prolonged cold spell could also create localized problems.

Senator Austin asked whether the government has any information on inventories of crude oil in the United States which, as the honourable senator stated, are well below normal levels at this time.

As of February 2, 1979, crude oil stocks were 299,611,000 barrels as compared to 339,861,000 barrels at the same time last year. This represents a decrease of about 12 per cent in crude oil inventories. In view of this situation, U.S. Energy Secretary Schlesinger recently stated that mandatory allocation of oil might be imposed as early as April 1, 1979. However, the United States is reportedly continuing its strategic crude oil stockpiling program despite the Iranian situation. The stockpile currently stands at just under 80 million barrels, with another 17 million barrels scheduled to be received this quarter. The oil retrieval equipment is to be in place by September, so presumably the strategic stockpile could be used to build inventories in the event this proves necessary.

On the same date—there were a great many questions on February 15—Senator Bosa asked:

Does the alleged diversion of oil by Exxon from Canada to other places lend strength to the... theory that we should have control of our own economic destiny?

The difficulties encountered with respect to Imperial demonstrate the disadvantages, in some circumstances, of Canadian refiners being supplied through a multinational intermediary. One method of obtaining greater control of our economic destiny in this context is to deal directly with the producer countries. In this regard, Imperial Oil, is reviewing its crude supply situation with an eye to establishing a direct contractual relationship with Venezuela.

Further discussions between Petro-Canada and Mexican authorities are proceeding as quickly as possible so as to obtain direct access to Mexican crude.

EXTENSION OF GAS PIPELINE FROM MONTREAL TO POINTS
EAST—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin asked about the federal policy regarding the gas pipeline from Montreal to points east.

The federal government's policy with respect to the expansion of natural gas markets in eastern Canada derives from the government's overall strategy of energy self-reliance. Self-reliance means reducing our vulnerability by supplying Canadian energy requirements from domestic resources to the greatest extent practicable. More specifically, it means that Canada must reduce its reliance on imported oil from insecure sources.

Canada's oil imports are concentrated in Quebec and the maritimes, and currently amount to some 500,000 barrels per day. Interfuel substitution—natural gas for oil—could significantly reduce this dependence. It has been estimated that gas sales in Quebec and the maritimes could be in the range of 200 billion cubic feet per year by 1990, or the equivalent of 100,000 barrels per day.

Thus federal government policy is to support gas market expansion in eastern Canada, provided this can be justified economically. The Government of Canada is not committed to interfuel substitution at any cost.

One application to build a pipeline east of Montreal has already been received from Q & M Pipelines, and another one is expected within the next few months from TransCanada Pipelines. Once these applications are received there will be public hearings conducted by the National Energy Board. The board will then consider the evidence and make a decision. It is expected that the board's decision will be made next fall.

Honourable senators, I have a number of other replies, but perhaps I have given an adequate number this evening unless there is a pressing need for others.

STATISTICS CANADA

COST-OF-LIVING INDEX—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It was reported in the media today that the cost-of-living index rose by 0.8 per cent. This increase is attributed to the high cost of vegetables and electricity during the month of January. My wife told me that vegetables that cost 30 or 40 cents a pound a few months ago cost $1.50 a pound in January.

I am wondering whether the leader is contemplating asking Statistics Canada to remove such luxuries from the package of items used to compute the cost-of-living index. They have tremendous repercussions in the economy, and are not truly representative of the increase in the cost of living.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator's observations will certainly be brought to the attention of the minister responsible for Statistics Canada.

Senator Flynn: Which one?

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

BALTIC HONORARY CONSULS

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am pleased to draw to your attention the presence of distinguished visitors in the Senate Gallery.

They are Honorary Consuls Dr. Jonas Zmuidzinass, Lithunia, Dr. Edward Upenicks of Latvia, and Mr. Ilmar Heinsoo of Estonia.

We wish them an interesting and happy visit to our capital and the Parliament Buildings, and hope to meet them in person tomorrow night in the Confederation Room on the occasion of the Seventh Baltic Evening in Ottawa.

THE SENATE

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Senator Denis: I see from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate that Senator Marshall is very curious. He is asking about 70 questions, and in most cases there are 10 more questions involved in each.

I would ask the Leader of the Government if he intends to answer all those questions this year or during the next 10 years? Is he going to ask the different departments to cease their normal work in order to answer these questions?

What is the cost? These questions cover about 17 pages every day of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. I want to know what these questions by Senator Marshall are costing.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall has a perfect right to direct any question he wishes to the government. He is aware that the preparation of replies to questions is an expensive procedure, but I am sure he asked none of his questions lightly or facetiously.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I do not know if it is my privilege to answer Senator Denis with respect to all the questions I have on the order paper. If I may raise it in the form of a point of order or a question of privilege, I think it is my duty, as it is the duty of all honourable senators, to ask through the Parliament of Canada those questions that provide information to the people of Canada in order to meet my responsibility. It is my right, as it is the right of Senator Denis, to protect the rights of all citizens of Canada. This is the reason why I placed these questions on the order paper. I can tell Senator Denis that there are going to be many more in the not too distant future.

Senator Denis: In answer to my good friend, I will say that I too am very curious. But if every senator were as curious as he, there would be 700 questions asked of every department.

● (2040)

Some of these questions could be answered by simply telephoning the various departments. To fill up the pages of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for weeks and weeks is a waste of money. I have not counted the questions, but I am not wrong in saying that they will require at least 500 answers. As I have said, these questions can be answered by making a small trip to the different departments of government.

Senator Marshall: I only wish the government could answer them that quickly. That is why I put them on the order paper, and I will continue to do so because that is my right.

Senator Forsey: On the point raised by Senator Marshall, many of these questions related to the proposed transfer of the Veterans Affairs Department to Prince Edward Island, and this matter is of very serious concern to the Royal Canadian Legion from which I have received some rather voluminous correspondence on the subject. They are very anxious to get answers to these questions.

Senator Denis: As a supplementary question, I ask the Leader of the Opposition how much it costs to print these 14 pages containing the questions asked by Senator Marshall. I suppose he is a rich man.

Senator Flynn: I will reply to you in the next session.

Senator Walker: Touché!

TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

DISTRIBUTION OF REPORT—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have been somewhat critical of the report of the Task Force on Canadian Unity. Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate aware that, while Senator Forsey has received 80 copies of that report, I was not even asked if I wished to have additional copies.

Senator Perrault: Obviously the allocation of this report has gone to Senator Forsey through some inadvertence.

Honourable senators, I was heartened by the remark the Leader of the Opposition made in response to the question posed by Senator Denis. He said that he would answer that question in the next session, so presumably he still expects to be the Leader of the Opposition then.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The Leader of the Government is, of course, unaware of the rules of this house. As Leader of the Opposition, nobody can put a question to me, so I indicated that I would be in the leader's place in the next session.

On the question of the distribution of the Pepin-Robarts report, I suppose the government has decided to leave it on the shelf and just forget about it. There is nothing to be done with these copies other than to distribute them to everyone.

Senator Denis: It was my mistake. I did not mean to ask a question of the Leader of the Opposition, because he cannot answer too many questions.

Senator Flynn: It is not your first nor your last mistake.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

HALIBUT FISHING INDUSTRY—INTERIM AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES—FURTHER QUESTION

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, if I might bring you back to something more substantive, I asked the Leader of the Government earlier this month a question regarding the halibut fishery off the Pacific coast. I gave the Leader of the Government notice late this afternoon that there have been reports in the media to the effect that the government has entered into a tentative agreement with the United States relative to that halibut fishery. I understand that the tentative agreement would allow Canadian fishermen to take 3 million pounds of halibut out of the Gulf of Alaska during the next two years, and, in return, American fishermen would be given access to 14.3 million pounds of ground fish.

The fishing industry, which includes the fishermen of British Columbia, has stated publicly that it finds this agreement highly unsatisfactory. I wonder whether the government has received representations to that effect and whether the Minister of Fisheries will be considering the tentative agreement in the light of its being unacceptable to the fishing industry of British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the courtesy extended by Senator Austin when he provided me with notice of this question.

The proposed agreement provides for Canada to receive in United States waters 2 million pounds of halibut in 1979, and 1 million pounds of halibut in 1980. In return, Canada has indicated that it would allocate to the United States 3,250 tons of ground fish off the B.C. coast.

This agreement was only negotiated ad referendum by the two countries' negotiators. The matter is now before the government, and Mr. LeBlanc was briefed on it today as to the details, and he, together with his colleague, Mr. Jamieson, is now considering an arrangement that has been worked out.

No decision has been taken as to whether to accept it or not, and it will be very carefully considered in light of the concerns that have been expressed by several west coast parliamentarians and advisers, such as Senator Austin.

Senator Flynn: Is he an adviser or a parliamentarian?

Senator Perrault: Both.

Senator Austin: I am always pleased to have Senator Flynn inquiring after my designations.

Honourable senators, I should like the Leader of the Government to inquire whether, indeed, the statement made by the President of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers' Union, Jack Nichol, is correct, that the ground fish stocks off the Pacific coast could not stand up to the fishing that this tentative agreement would allow American fishermen to do.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

ENERGY

STRATEGIC OIL RESERVES—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to come back to the oil question and remind the Leader of the Government that he owes me an answer to a question I asked the other day on the International Energy Agency. I do not need to have it tonight, but I should like to have it before Bill C-42 comes before us. Obviously, there is a strong link between our international undertakings, whatever they may be—and it is a mystery to me at the moment what they are—and the powers that the government wishes to assume under the bill, so I put that request to him.

While I am on this topic, I should also like to ask the government what responsibility it recognizes as being its with respect to the maintenance and establishment of strategic oil reserves in the country.

I have been reading the reports from the other place as well as I can, but I do not think there has been any clear statement about who is responsible for deciding what our strategic oil reserves ought to be, who is responsible for carrying out the policy that arises from that, and where we may look to find the mover in making sure that our strategic oil supplies are satisfactory.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question is a very relevant one and I will attempt to obtain a detailed reply.

Presumably, the National Energy Board is somewhat involved in the process of ensuring an adequacy of all types of energy supply for Canada, but I am prepared to bring a full reply to this chamber.

● (2050)

Senator Roblin: I appreciate that comment, but my impression is that the National Energy Board is more concerned with making sure that we use the resources, either of oil or gas, we have in the country in such a way that our long-term position is protected in respect of those resources. What I am really talking about, however, is the fact that we are deficient in oil supplies, that we do not have enough of our own, and, therefore, we do get caught in this question of strategic supplies in a situation such as we have now. So I appreciate the fact that my honourable friend will get me that information.

I would also like him to let us know what that policy is, if he is able to ascertain it.

Senator Flynn: If there is one.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 26—By Senator Marshall:

1. What agreements were entered into under the Employment Tax Credit Program from the date of its inception?

2. How many jobs were created by these agreements?

Reply by the Minister of Employment and Immigration:

1. As at December 8, 1978, 6,414 agreements have been entered into under the Employment Tax Credit Program.

2. 10,137 jobs were created by these agreements.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith moved the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill addresses itself to the purpose of limiting the approval of projects under the Health Resources Fund Act submitted prior to November 4, 1978. I propose to make some brief remarks, in support of the second reading of this bill, to explain the purpose of the bill and what it says, and to give some of the historical background to explain how it proposes to achieve that objective.

As I mentioned, the purpose is to limit the approval of projects under the fund set up by the act. Any projects submitted prior to November 4, 1978, will be fulfilled and accepted, and those thereafter will, in effect, be cut off.

The bill is a short one, and to understand it it is necessary to understand something of the scheme of the act itself. The act, in its definition sections, contains one aspect that is important to us. It sets up a Health Resources Fund for health training facilities. It is important not to confuse the objective of the bill, which is to set up facilities, with the research and training projects which take place as a result of those facilities. The emphasis and focus of the bill is to assist the provinces in setting up health training facilities which are defined as facilities:

(a) for the training of persons in the health professions or in occupations associated with the health professions, or

(b) for the conducting of research in the health fields,

The bill is not in itself a measure for the support of research; it is a measure to help the provinces build facilities for those purposes.

The rest of the bill sets up the fund—that is section 3—it sets up the system of contributions by the federal government to the provinces; it sets up the Health Resources Advisory Committee; and it provides for the making of regulations.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): May I interrupt the honourable senator? The bill to which he is speaking is, I understand, Bill C-2. He may be talking about the Health Resources Fund Act when he refers to section 3, but the bill before me has only one clause in it. I am a little confused.

Senator Frith: The reason why I am explaining the bill and the act is in order that the bill now before the Senate, and referred to by Senator Connolly, can be understood. I find it difficult to understand the bill as it stands without understanding what it amends, because it is such a short bill.

That is the scheme of the original act, and the bill now before us amends that act. It amends section 3 to which I have referred—that is the section that sets up the fund—by adding subsection (5). Section 3 has four subsections at present, and the bill would add subsection (5), which reads:

(5) No payment shall be made under this Act in respect of any cost incurred in respect of a health training facility—

I have already mentioned what that means.

—unless payment of a contribution toward the cost thereof was authorized by the Minister pursuant to subsection 4(1) or 5(1) before November 4, 1978.

I shall now give honourable senators some of the historical background in order that they might understand to what the cut-off applies. The Health Resources Fund was appropriated under the act—I am now speaking of the act as distinct from the bill—in an amount of $500 million to be applied to costs incurred between January 1, 1966 and December 31, 1980.

If honourable senators are interested in following these details, although it is not all that complicated, a little arithmetic is necessary to understand what takes place in the historical development of the act. We start out with $500 million to be applied to costs incurred between January 1, 1966 and December 31, 1980. Again, the costs about which I am speaking are those which the federal government contributed toward the building of health facilities in the provinces. It was done through the provinces. The provinces started the project, and it was a matter of the federal government helping. That $500 million was divided, under the act, into three parts.

The evolution of what happened to those segments of the $500 million is as follows:

First, $300 million was allocated to the provinces on a per capita basis. I shall call that the per capita allocation. Secondly, $25 million was allocated to the four Atlantic provinces for joint projects of those provinces. So we now have a total of $325 million. Thirdly, $175 million was to be allocated by the Governor in Council on a flexible basis. Therefore, we have $300 million per capita, $25 million for the Atlantic provinces, and $175 million for the Governor in Council to be allocated on a more flexible basis. Those amounts total $500 million.

Contributions approved by the minister are payable to the provinces in amounts up to 50 per cent of the reasonable cost. To be eligible, the projects must be included in a provincial five-year program for the development of health training facilities—not research programs, but facilities. Each provincial five-year program must be approved in principle by the Health Resources Advisory Committee which was set up by the original act. That committee consists of 11 members, ten of whom are appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of each of the 10 provinces. The eleventh member is the Deputy Minister of National Health and Welfare who serves as the chairman. Since the purpose of the act is to aid the provinces in construction costs—and that includes renovations—of health training facilities, the advisory committee consists of someone representing each one of the provinces plus, as I have said, the Deputy Minister of National Health and Welfare.

● (2100)

Under the provisions of section 4(2)(b) of the act, the Governor in Council, on May 25, 1971, apportioned the $175 million unallocated portion of the Health Resources Fund on the following basis—and please remember that we had $300 million to start with on a per capita basis, $25 million to the Atlantic provinces for joint projects, and $175 million in a joint or flexible fund. In 1971, that sum of $175 million was split again, and $100 million was given to the provinces on a per capita basis according to the 1966 census, so that it was added to the first type, and then $75 million was split for support of health, training and research projects of national significance. There will be a little more about that in a moment.

There is the background. That is what the act first set up, namely, the $300 million, the $25 million, and the $175 million. Subsequently, of that $175 million, $100 million, in effect, was added to that allocated on a per capita basis, and $75 million was for matters of national significance, so we still end up with three parts: the $300 million, to which was added $100 million, making $400 million on a per capita basis, $25 million for the provinces, and the remaining $75 million for projects of national significance.

What has happened since then? As you remember, the act was to run through 1980. The legislation that is before us is going to cut it off before 1980, and limit the contributions to applications made before the date of November 4 referred to in this bill. What has happened is that the total amount committed up to this date is $427.6 million, or 85.52 per cent of the total $500 million appropriated.

Remember that again we have another distinction. To follow what is happening—not that it is that complicated—we have to distinguish between what is appropriated and what is actually spent. That will develop subsequently. The $427.6 million has been appropriated as follows: $105.6 million to medical schools and multi-purpose buildings in health sciences complexes—and we are still talking about facilities, as I have mentioned consistently throughout. Then there is $130.2 million to university hospitals; $91.5 million to affiliated hospitals; $23.3 million to dental schools; and $76 million to nursing schools, dental auxiliary schools and other health manpower training institutions. Those are allocations.

Total payments from the fund since its inauguration stand at $356.9 million, or 71.38 per cent. If anyone is following the arithmetic, the appropriations are $427.6 million, or 85.52 per cent of the total $500 million. Actual payments from the fund are $356.9 million, or 71.38 per cent. Of course, that leaves $70.7 million of the appropriated amount to be paid out—and it will be paid—on submission of claims over the next three or four years. Thirty-three million dollars has been allocated for this fiscal year to meet anticipated claims—that is, claims that are going to come forward because the cut-off applies to the appropriations. Once that has happened, the payments are still going to be made to fulfil the appropriations.

What is the geographic distribution? That is something we should know about. If we look at the geographical distribution of the 243 projects that have been approved, we see the following—and we are talking about amounts appropriated and not necessarily spent—five in Newfoundland, in the amount of $30.5 million; two in Prince Edward Island in the amount of $2.4 million; seven in Nova Scotia in the amount of $34.1 million; 12 in New Brunswick in the amount of $15.5 million; 57 in Quebec in the amount of $104.0 million; 113 in Ontario in the amount of $141.4 million; 11 in Manitoba in the amount of $16.7 million; 10 in Saskatchewan in the amount of $20.3 million; eight in Alberta in the amount of $29.1 million; 17 in British Columbia in the amount of $33.5 million; and one in the Northwest Territories in the amount of $113,000.

With respect to the per capita allocation of $400 million—and remember we started with $300 million, and then took $100 million of the $175 million and put it into the per capita allocation—the amounts committed by province to this date, as a percentage of the $400 million, are as follows. Incidentally, honourable senators, I must put these figures on the record because they relate to one other aspect that we should know about, and that perhaps will be inquired into if the Senate refers the bill to committee, because you will see in a moment that there is a bit of inequity in the distribution of the commitments, and a scheme for the correction of that has been developed. The figures are as follows: Newfoundland, has 100 per cent, $9.8 million; Prince Edward Island, 100 per cent, $2.2 million; Nova Scotia, 85 per cent, $12.9 million; New Brunswick, 100 per cent, $12.3 million; Quebec, 82 per cent, $94.9 million; Ontario, 100 per cent, $139.1 million; Manitoba, 87 per cent, $16.7 million; Saskatchewan, 100 per cent, $19.1 million; Alberta, 100 per cent, $29.2 million; British Columbia, 88 per cent, $33.1 million; Northwest Territories, 17 per cent, $0.1 million.

In order to improve the equity in distribution of commitments, particularly for Quebec and the Northwest Territories, which are the two provinces showing the lowest percentage of commitments from the per capita allocations, we would have to make available, as an additional step, between $3 million and $4 million. The hope is that these particular problems can be resolved through other means, and those other means could be inquired into at the committee stage if the Senate agrees that this bill should go to a committee.

Now, if we are following this, we might want to know what happened to the $25 million portion of the Health Resources Fund that was set aside for the Atlantic provinces, because remember there were the three elements, namely, the original per capita allocation to which $100 million was added, the $25 million for the Atlantic provinces, and the $75 million for commitments of national significance. We have finished with the first of those subjects. The second, the $25 million portion of the fund, was set aside for the Atlantic provinces. There, in some instances, when combined with other elements of the fund, the federal contribution attained up to 75 per cent of estimated costs, and approvals have fully committed this portion, which indicates a high commitment and utilization rate in the Atlantic provinces, consistent with the original per capita fund, where they were very high also, as we have just seen.

Now I come to the third part, namely, the national significance of special portion of the fund. Remember that we had $175 million less the $100 million, so that that was an amount of $75 million. Of that fund, $32.9 million was committed to projects having a national interest or which demonstrated a unique or innovative element on the national scene.

The 10 projects which have received contributions from this portion of the fund, are as follows:

● (2110)

In Newfoundland, for the construction of the Health Sciences Centre, $10 million. That was a special project to allow them to build their medical school.

There is a dental school at Dalhousie University in Halifax, and that was a special case because it was spread out over the four Atlantic provinces.

There are two in Quebec. There is the Hôpital Neurologique de Montréal, $2,160,399, and that was for special training. There is also a new wing for the Hôpital Neurologique de Montréal, the Aile Wilder Penfield, $4 million, and that was also special training. In Quebec also there is the Institut de Diagnostic et de Recherche Clinique, Montréal at $2.6 million roughly. That was a special because it dealt with hypertension. Another one in Quebec—and this comes under the “national significance” category—is the Laboratoire de la Lèpre, Institut Armand-Frappier, for approximately $300,000. It is concerned with the connection between leprosy and immunology.

[Senator Frith.]

There was an optometry building at the University of Waterloo in Ontario for some $2.3 million and a Dental Nurses' Training School in Regina. The Dental Clinic Building, Saskatoon, involved a unique dental training program for nurses. Then there is a Radiobiology facility in Vancouver for some $450,000.

Each of those items fell within the category of what we have seen fit to call, in this presentation anyway, the third category, the “national significance” category.

I indicated that the fund was established to assist the provinces in constructing or renovating health training facilities in order to have an adequate output in the supply of health manpower throughout Canada. So, honourable senators, now that we have talked about how much money was appropriated, how it was allocated and how much was spent, you might want to know what were the results. The act's program has been successful in providing the necessary facilities to meet the current and anticipated demands for most health disciplines over the next decade or so. So it has essentially achieved its objective, and has, as we have seen, committed and made provision for the spending of almost all of the $500 million.

Since the mid-1960s, when the Health Resources Fund was established—and that was under the original act which our bill is amending—the annual output of graduates from our institutions increased over 100 per cent for most of the disciplines in the health field, and I think it is generally accepted that the programs under the act and their contributions to the provinces for the building of facilities made a very meaningful contribution to that output. For instance, data recorded for graduates in 1966 and 1976, a ten-year period, gives us the following comparison numbers for selected categories:

Annual Number of Graduates in a Selected Number of Health Manpower Categories

Canada Health Manpower Category	No. of Graduates Per Year at Beginning of Fund	No. of Graduates 1976
Audiologists and Speech Therapists	30	147
Biomedical Engineers	14	39
Chiropractors	39	99
Dental Assistants	58	917
Dental Hygienists	82	350
Dentists	296	465
Dieticians	200	281
Health Record Administrators	172	215
Health Service Executives	30	105
Medical Laboratory Technologists	265	1,200
Nurses	7,387	10,051
Nursing Assistants	3,800	5,506
Occupational Therapists	78	237
Optometrists	34	96
Pharmacists	358	646
Physicians	880	1,725
Physiotherapists	232	446
Public Health Inspectors	40	106

Canada Health Manpower Category	No. of Graduates Per Year at Beginning of Fund	No. of Graduates 1976
Radiological Technicians	662	708
Respiratory Technologists	9	138
Veterinarians	103	226
TOTALS	14,769	23,703
Increase of 8,939

All those figures are of interest, honourable senators, but some are more dramatic than others because what we are looking at is the number of graduates per year when the fund started compared with the number of graduates in 1976, which covers a ten-year period. For example, under dental assistants, which you will find as the fourth on the list, the number of graduates at the beginning when this act took effect was 58, and the number of graduates in 1976 was 917. Dental hygienists: 82 at the beginning of the act's functioning, and ten years later this figure had risen to 350.

I am not skipping any here, honourable senators, in the sense that all of them show an increase, but these are particularly dramatic. Nurses: the number of graduates at the beginning of the period was 7,387 and in 1976 it was 10,051. Physicians: the number jumped from 880 to 1,725. Physiotherapists increased from 232 to 446. Those are some of the examples of the increase in the number of graduates, and, of course, there is no suggestion that this act is entitled to all the credit for that, but it does seem generally accepted that it made a very significant contribution by helping the provinces build the facilities which in turn made it possible to have that kind of increase in graduate output.

Approximately 25 per cent, or over $100 million, of the Health Resources Fund approved has been utilized for the construction, renovation and equipping of research facilities. Remember there are two categories referred to in the act—research and training. The manpower ratios for all disciplines in health has shown continued improvement. For example, the number of health professionals and paraprofessionals to population shows a substantial change over the eight-year period from 1968 to 1976. With your permission, honourable senators, I should like to place a table on the record which shows the ratio of physicians to population improved from one to 740 in 1968 to one to 578 in 1976. The ratio of nurses went from one to 187 and one to 129. All of these figures show that kind of an improvement. The full list of categories and their ratios is as follows:

Physicians	1— 740 pop.	1— 578 pop.
Nurses	1— 187 pop.	1— 129 pop.
Dentists	1— 3,013 pop.	1— 2,438 pop.
Pharmacists	1— 2,010 pop.	1— 1,557 pop.
Physiotherapists	1— 8,106 pop.	1— 5,128 pop.
Optometrists	1—13,981 pop.	1—12,336 pop.
Chiropractors	1—20,860 pop.	1—16,278 pop.
Medical Lab. Tech.	1— 2,866 pop.	1— 1,416 pop.
Dental Hygienists	1—38,397 pop.	1—13,765 pop.
Radiological Technicians	1— 5,636 pop.	1— 3,144 pop.

As a result, we now have a surplus of nurses and an acceptable doctor-population ratio. The ratios for all of the disciplines have improved and will continue to improve in relation to economic and social requirements. Again, at the risk of boring honourable senators, I am not suggesting that this act produced that result all by itself. But, as I said, it does seem to be generally accepted that it played a very significant part, and made a very significant contribution.

What kind of yardstick do we have? I have talked about the relationship of these disciplines to population, but how do we know whether that is good or bad? We know it has improved, but we have to have some yardstick to decide whether the result is good in comparison, but in comparison with what? Well, I have been provided with some comparisons on the international level to serve as a yardstick—and I suppose this is the last year in which we can talk about yardsticks; I don't know what the metric stick is. In any event, using it with some poetic licence, on the international level our manpower ratios compare favourably with a number of other countries. Here I am speaking of the ratio discipline or profession to population. The ratio of physicians in Canada in 1974—not the mid-period but towards the end of the period we are looking at—was better than or equal to that in Australia, the U.S.A., England and Wales, Scotland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, Netherlands, Luxembourg, France, Spain, Portugal, and Austria. We were surpassed moderately by Belgium, Italy, West Germany, Switzerland and the U.S.S.R.

As for dentists, Canada fared better than England and Wales, Northern Ireland, Scotland, Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Spain and Austria. Australia, the U.S.A., Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland, West Germany, Switzerland, U.S.S.R. had better ratios. As for nurses, Canada had a better ratio than all countries mentioned except Denmark.

• (2120)

Honourable senators, the fund during the period 1966 to 1978 met the objective of having the necessary facilities—and again I underline that it is facilities we are talking about—on a national basis to train health personnel in such numbers to meet the current and anticipated demands. For example, our medical schools have levelled off on the number of trainees accepted, and some are operating below the potential capacity.

Recently the greater number of projects provided under the fund have been to assist with the expansion and upgrading of teaching hospitals. With the trend now towards a reduction in training positions in these institutions, this type of requirement has diminished.

Honourable senators, in view of the economic conditions and the fact that the program has achieved its planned objective of assisting the provinces with the upgrading and construction of facilities for the training of health personnel in adequate numbers, I recommend that we support Bill C-2. There may be a number of questions. I am sure there are. I suggest with respect that the Senate consider referring this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. I thank you for your attention, honourable senators.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I understood the sponsor of the bill to say that payments of the balance of the funds allotted or approved by the first week in November 1978 would be made during the next three to four years. My distinct understanding was that all payments had to be made by the end of December 1980, and I should like to hear my honourable friend's comments on that either now or when he can get the information. After I have heard what he has to say, I shall have a few other remarks to make.

Senator Frith: I have no instructions that the cutoff date for the payments is to be 1980. My instructions are, as I mentioned, that the payments would be spread out over a period as long as the allocations or commitments have been made.

Senator Hicks: Would my honourable friend please verify that, because that is quite important?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Hicks: Let me just add a word, then, to what has been said, because I have some reservations about this bill. It is a pity that having embarked upon a program which would have made $500 million available for these laudible projects, we should cut it off in midstream. As always happens, of course, it tends to hurt the provinces that find it more difficult to put forth their share of the money. Due to special circumstances, three out of the four maritime or Atlantic provinces managed to get 100 per cent of their moneys in, but note that the rich provinces, Alberta and Ontario, got all of their money in. The amount of money to be saved by doing this is relatively small.

Despite the great achievements that Canadian medical schools and health and research institutions have accomplished—with considerable assistance from this legislation—we do not show up well, when it comes to research including medical research, in comparison with the other industrialized or developed countries of the world.

It seems to me a shame that we have had to cut this off at this stage. I am not unappreciative of the necessity for government restraint. I am concerned about the great deficit that the Government of Canada is running at the present time, but I can think of many other areas where we might serve our people better by cutting back than by cutting back in this important area of teaching and research in the health sciences and in medicine and medically related activities and professions.

I hope that before too long the Government of Canada will be in a position to re-enter support for these kinds of activities that are so important in the complicated world in which we are living today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Hicks has characteristically put his finger on the two principles that the Senate committee will want to examine and that the Senate will want to have a report on as a result of that examination.

I would just comment, to underline the questions he has raised, that the position of the government and of the minister—and I am not trying to nit-pick on expressions—is that they are not cutting off in midstream but close to the end of the stream. We are not talking about 50 per cent of the fund but about 85 per cent of the fund. That is something that can be explored, because, after all, 15 per cent of $500 million is still a lot of money and that may be exactly what the honourable senator wants to examine.

I should also like to underline once again, and in so doing sharpen the focus of the committee on this aspect, assuming it goes to committee, that we are not talking about cutting off research projects in the sense that on-stream projects are being stopped by the government. What the government is doing in this particular act is building facilities. The money here does not go to programs but goes to facilities, and it is the position of the government—and the Senate may want to examine this aspect—that the facilities, or most of them, have been built and the research programs that are carried on in those facilities are funded by other sources. They are not funded by this particular bill. That may be the kind of thing my friend Senator Hicks wishes to inquire into.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I cannot let that statement go unchallenged. The government has ceased increasing the facilities available for these activities. It is quite true that the activities or projects are supported from different sources, but if the facilities are not there the projects cannot go forth. Before my own medical school at Dalhousie University built its new medical sciences building, we were able to attract research grants amounting to a few hundred thousands of dollars. But, when we got the facility of the new medical sciences building, we multiplied that within a very few years by a factor of from three to five. I cannot remember which exactly.

If we do not go on providing the facilities, then we do not enable good men to attract the research grants that they deserve. I still say that Canada's record in this area is not among the best of the developed nations in the world, and I hope, understanding as well as I do the necessity for financial restraint at the present time, that Canada may be in a position to proceed further with this program, or programs of this nature, in the not too distant future.

Senator Frith: As we have seen, I think we will find in the committee that there may be some cases in which facilities should be continued in order to continue with the work, as Senator Hicks has said.

There is some evidence, and you will hear about it at the committee stage, to indicate that in some cases on the other side of it the facilities are there and are not being used even to capacity at the present time. That is the balance I am sure the committee will want to look at.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I wonder if I could ask the honourable senator a couple of questions. First, what warning was given to the provinces that this cutoff date would be improved? Second, at that time what projects which had not been approved and which have not yet been approved, if any, were known to the government to be likely to come forward from any province or from all provinces?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, at this stage my instructions can only help me to answer part of the second question. I do not know about the warning to the provinces. I can find out or the matter can be raised at the committee, depending on what Senator Smith prefers.

With respect to the question about the cutoff date, I know of only one project that seems to have come to an undesirable end in terms of not having met the cutoff, and that is one with reference to British Columbia which you may want to ask about at the committee also. I can get information tomorrow for the Senate with respect to the warning given as to the cutoff date, or this question can be dealt with in committee, whatever the Senate wishes.

● (2130)

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I appreciate, of course, that all this information could be made available in committee, but it may be very useful in facilitating further debate on the motion for second reading. Consequently, I would be appreciative if the sponsor could find the answer and give it to us tomorrow, if possible.

Senator Frith: I agree that this information is relevant to the debate on second reading, and I shall endeavour to provide it to the house tomorrow.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, Senator Frith indicated there has been an increase in the number of doctors, dentists and nurses. I have to quarrel with that statement, because it is obvious that in isolated and remote areas it is always a problem to provide doctors, dentists and nurses. Doctors do not seem to want to go to remote areas. The honourable senator only gave a sketchy outline of the attributes of the bill.

Does he have a breakdown of the increase in the number of doctors, dentists and nurses in remote areas of the country, particularly in Atlantic Canada? Is there a breakdown that emphasizes the lack of attention remote areas get because doctors and dentists do not want to go to them?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the figures I gave reflected the improvement in the ratio of doctors, dentists, nurses, and so on, to population. I am sure that the information Senator Marshall wants would be of interest. I suggest, with respect, that it is asking a good deal of legislation, which supplies money to the provinces for training facilities, to expect that it would make provision to send people to places where, as he said, they do not want to go.

If there is any breakdown available, I could present it in committee, and I could ask the departmental officials to give us any material they have. Although it is not strictly related to this bill, it is a matter of substantial interest in the areas referred to by the honourable senator.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Frith a question. I may have misunderstood the beginning of his lucid dénouement of this bill, but it seems to me that surely one part of the problem with respect to the need for training facilities is that we have 1,000 applicants for every space available in the medical schools of Canada.

Was this explained at the beginning? I cannot understand the rationale. The government proposed that funds be made available until 1980. If we have this tremendous shortage of facilities for training doctors, how can we say that things have improved so much that we are going to cut them off in 1978?

Senator Frith: I am not able to agree or disagree that there are 1,000 applicants for every space. There may well be. My experience would indicate that there are many more applicants for medical school than there are admissions. But the reason for refusing admission might not be related to the question of facilities of the type provided for in this bill.

It is possible that the problem raised by Senator Bell is the same as that raised by Senator Marshall. It is a matter of great concern and importance to the country, but it is not really related to this bill. It is only because it happens to deal with the subject matter of training facilities for doctors, among others.

Lack of facilities might not be the reason why people are not admitted to medical school. In fact, instructions I have been given are that in some cases the facilities that have been provided under the bill and pursuant to the bill are not being fully used.

Senator Macdonald: In reference to the $25 million allotted to the Atlantic provinces, would the senator tell me if that has been wholly used or wholly committed?

Senator Frith: I will have to look that up. I think not, but just give me a moment. The instructions I have are that the $25 million portion of the Health Resources Fund set aside for the Atlantic provinces, in some instances, when combined with other elements of the fund, attained up to 75 per cent of estimated costs. Approvals have fully committed this portion, which indicates a high commitment utilization in the Atlantic provinces. So, the federal contribution is up to 75 per cent of costs, and approvals have been fully committed.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Honourable Senator Frith a question in regard to the bill. Have there been representations on the subject of the bill from the organizations of the health professions generally or from the organizations in any part of the country? As a maritimer in partibus infidelium, I am particularly interested in the questions that have been raised by a succession of senators from that part of the country.

Senator Frith: That is a very good question. I don't know the answer. I will try to get it by tomorrow. Would the honourable senator like to have it for the debate portion or for the committee portion?

Senator Forsey: I would like to have it as soon as possible, yes. I don't want to place upon the Honourable Senator Frith "burdens grievous to be borne."

Senator Frith: I will get the answer, as Honourable Senator Forsey says, as soon as possible, no matter how grievous the burden might be.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators. I would also like to put a question to the honourable senator, because he has done so well and has been able to answer so many questions tonight.

Did I understand him correctly when he cited numerical increases from 7,000 nurses to 10,000 nurses in a period of 10 years? What does that represent on a per thousand population of 10 years ago to date. Does that reflect an increase in the percentage on a per thousand basis?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, you would have to compare these two. You would have to work from the two tables.

• (2140)

The example I gave, and the example Senator Bosa chose, was nurses. At the beginning of the period of the funding set up under this act the number was 7,387, and in 1976 it was 10,051. I did not have the relationship to population on that comparative basis. I simply had it on an absolute basis, so you will have to work back from that. You will have to work from the two tables, that is correct. No, I am sorry, that is not right. I did have the 1968 comparison. The tables that appear in Hansard show the 1968 to 1976 comparison. However, I only referred to two or three of them. In 1968, for example, the ratio for nurses was 1 to 187 of population, and in 1976 it is 1 to 129. So, the comparisons are on the record.

Senator Macdonald: I move the adjournment of the debate to Thursday next.

Senator Frith: May I ask for some guidance, honourable senators. In order to obtain the information I have been asked to provide on second reading, may I adjourn the debate in my name so that I can obtain that material, and then Senator Macdonald can adjourn the debate.

Senator Langlois: He wishes to adjourn it.

Senator Frith: If it is adjourned in his name, when do I provide the material Senator Smith requires?

The Hon. the Speaker: When we call the item tomorrow.

Senator Frith: I wonder, then, if I could have permission from honourable senators to adjourn the debate in my name.

An Hon. Senator: You cannot adjourn the debate.

Senator Frith: Let me tell you what I am suggesting, and then honourable senators more experienced than I can tell me what procedure to follow to achieve it. I want to get as much material on the record tomorrow in answer to the questions raised. For example, Senator Smith's question is directly relevant, and can be directly relevant, to second reading debate. Would it not be better for me to put that material on the record and then sit down, and allow Senator Macdonald to adjourn the debate?

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave, you will be able to answer all those questions tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL SESSION, LISBON, PORTUGAL—
DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 14, 1979, the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator McDonald calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-fourth annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Lisbon, Portugal, from 25th to 30th November, 1978, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the active participation of senators and members of the House of Commons in the Canadian delegations to the North Atlantic Assembly in recent years, particularly since the Helsinki Agreement of 1975, has won Canada a prominent role in this important international forum. For three years, Paul Langlois, M.P., has been unanimously elected treasurer of this assembly, an important post. For two years, Ralph Stewart, M.P., has been chairman of the Committee of Education, Cultural Affairs and Information. Several Canadian parliamentarians have been elected rapporteurs of committees. They are: Ian Watson, M.P., Committee on Science and Technology; Senator A. H. McDonald, Military Committee; and myself, Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, which is part of the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information. This subcommittee meets three times a year.

Our role in the assembly has increased in recent years thanks to the effective leadership of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association, of which our colleague, Senator A. H. McDonald, is at present chairman. I want to congratulate him not only on his election to this responsible position for which, because of his knowledge and experience, he is highly qualified, but also on his untiring efforts and leadership.

Our delegations have been well chosen and fully briefed on all matters of concern to the NATO Alliance, and consequently have been able to play an important and often decisive part in the work of all the committees and the plenary sessions. Our effectiveness has greatly improved after the adoption of the principle of continuity of delegations—not more than one-third turnover each year—and because of our unanimous stand on matters deliberated by the assembly. Unlike most of the other NATO members, Canadian delegations have pursued a bi-partisan approach and stance, always presenting a united front. This has been the strength of Canada, and has won us respect, recognition and prestige at the North Atlantic Assembly meetings.

We can indeed be proud of the participation and the admirable job done by Senator McDonald. His speech in the Senate the other day demonstrated his profound knowledge of the military aspects of the alliance.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: The factual information that he conveyed to this chamber is to all freedom-loving democrats frightening, alarming and shocking. The Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact countries have about 300,000 more troops on their front-line in Europe than do NATO countries, backed by 30,000 tanks against our 9,000 tanks, and heavy, light and rocket artillery in the ratio of two to one. The Soviet Union continues to produce tanks, artillery and missiles on a large scale, far outstripping the NATO countries.

The U.S.S.R. today possesses the largest navy in the world, which is constantly expanding at a rapid rate and whose presence is seen in every ocean of the world. It has the largest air force, with superior and advanced aircraft, of which some 800 planes are capable of bombing North America and returning home. Its defence budget is estimated at about 13 per cent, and this has been rising annually. It is more than double that of the United States and much higher than that of other NATO countries. This is a bitter pill for us to swallow.

The threat to NATO is greater today than it has ever been since its inception in 1948. Let us keep in mind that Soviet Premier Khrushchev stated in Vienna that the Russian communist regime was out to bury the west. It has consistently been the aggressor, expanding the Soviet Russian empire by taking over the European satellites. It has been interfering militarily in the internal affairs of many countries throughout the world and plotting to overthrow many existing governments and setting up communist puppet governments.

The West cannot rely on the hostility between Red China and Soviet Russia to save the situation. If the democracies hope to survive, they cannot remain complacent and indifferent, but must take measures immediately to strengthen substantially the defence capabilities of NATO while there still is time left. Canada, spending only 1.8 per cent of its GNP for defence purposes, must contribute its proper share by increasing considerably its budget for defence purposes and giving co-operation to improve all aspects of the alliance.

While bolstering our defences against a possible attack and aggression of the Soviet Union, the West must also viably counteract communist propaganda designed to subvert our democracies. In this respect we have a very strong weapon—the propagation and the defence of human rights. Fortunately, a great opportunity was given to us by the Helsinki Agreement of 1975, which was signed by the U.S.S.R. and the Warsaw Pact states, and which was reviewed at the Belgrade Conference culminating in the “Concluding Document”. Having been an observer at this conference, I presented my report to the Senate on April 5 last.

When we look back at the Helsinki Declaration of 1975 we must remember that the Western democracies and the Soviet Union with its satellites signed this Final Act with different and diverging motives and objectives. The Western countries, particularly those in NATO, stressed paramountly the respect of human rights and a freer exchange of ideas and people across the borders in order to gradually liberalize the communist societies, and thus bring them closer to our Western societies. The Soviet Union with the Warsaw Pact countries, however, stressed the relaxation of tensions in Europe through the détente, the ratification of the international borders that had been established by the Soviet occupation of the Baltic States and the satellites, freer trade and accessibility to Western technology, thus regarding the Helsinki Accord as a kind of peace treaty ending the Second World War.

In assessing the implementation of the Final Act at the Belgrade Conference both sides judged the outcome from their own point of view. There was some agreement that progress, even how little, had been made and therefore the exercise was considered worthwhile. The West, however, was greatly disappointed that the Soviet Union down-played the issue of human rights, assailing the Western democracies for interfering in the internal affairs of the Soviet Union and the “socialist countries” and defending all dissidents, who were regarded by the U.S.S.R. as criminals.

One thing must be made very clear at this time. The signatories of the Helsinki Final Act are not allies. The 15 NATO countries are allies dedicated to the principles of freedom, democracy and human rights. The Warsaw Pact countries, under the leadership of the Soviet Union, are their own allies, dedicated to the propagation of communism, the destruction of capitalism and world revolution—the antithesis of the way of life that we hold dear. The communist bloc countries evidently are our enemies. In our dealings with them, this must always be kept in mind. They treat the Western democracies as enemies.

There are circles that look upon the Belgrade conference with cynicism and despair, and understandably so. It does appear that the Soviet Union has no intention of honouring the Helsinki promises, while at the same time it is increasing repressive measures against the dissidents as well as increasing its military might. But one must not lose sight of the efficacy of the Helsinki principles and the Helsinki process.

The publication in Pravda in Moscow of the full texts of the Helsinki Accords in the fall of 1975 gave a new impetus to the Soviet dissidents and to the human rights movement in the U.S.S.R. On May 12, 1976, a Helsinki monitoring group was organized in Moscow, headed by Academician Yuri Orlov. Later in November a similar group was formed in Kiev, Ukraine. The chairman, Mykola Rudenko, and the secretary of this group, Yury Tykhy, were arrested in February 1977, and later tried, the former receiving a seven-year prison term and five years' exile, and the latter a 10-year term and five years' exile. Both houses of the Canadian Parliament unanimously protested these arrests and requested the prisoners' release, but to no avail. Other Helsinki monitoring committees sprang up in Lithuania, Georgia and Armenia.

Russian activists such as Sakharov, Solzhenitsyn, Bukovsky, Alekseyeva, and others supported these groups. Despite repression, arrests and expulsions of some leading dissidents, the human rights movement appears to be steadily growing in the U.S.S.R. and other communist countries, as is evident from the severe sentences meted out to Shcharansky, Ginsburg, Orlov and Lukianenko, and the steady persecution of religion and religious leaders and activists.

These courageous people, who are risking their lives for the cause, are fully aware that the Soviet Union torpedoed the human rights issue at the Belgrade Conference. The Soviet dissidents, as well as those in the satellite countries, are pinning their hopes on the implementation of the Helsinki principles. Consequently, we who believe in these principles cannot let them down. The Helsinki process must continue and become more effective at the forthcoming Madrid Review Conference in 1980.

In response to critics who state that increased pressure from the West impels the Kremlin forcibly to crush dissent, Andrei Sakharov, the father of the Soviet hydrogen bomb, Nobel Prize winner, and the guiding light of the human rights movement in the U.S.S.R., said that détente unaccompanied by increased trust and democratization was a danger, not a blessing, that rapprochement without democratization in the U.S.S.R. was worse than no rapprochement at all. With unswerving faith in the cause of human rights, Sakharov, on behalf of the dissidents, makes the following appeal to the Western democracies:

Resolute and ever-growing pressure by public and official bodies of the West—up to the highest—the defence of principles and of specific people can only bring positive results. Every case of human rights violations must become a political problem for the leaders of the culprit countries.

The four annual sessions of the North Atlantic Assembly, which were held subsequent to the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, placed great emphasis on “a comprehensive application of the Helsinki Principles”, particularly on the free flow of information and people. Member governments of NATO were urged “to monitor carefully the implementation of human, cultural, educational and information obligations”.

A Standing Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People was established, and it has been regularly publishing a quarterly bulletin—I have issue number nine before me—for which I am now responsible. It has been intensively presenting the monitoring of the Helsinki Act by most of the NATO countries. The Canadian government has been fully co-operating in the monitoring process. This constant monitoring pressure, which has already yielded some tangible results—family reunification, for example—will continue and will be reviewed at the Twenty-fifth North Atlantic Assembly in Ottawa this fall.

It should be noted that at the North Atlantic Assembly annual session in Lisbon, Portugal, last November, delegates displayed irritation at the prospects of the Review Conference scheduled to be held in Madrid, Spain, in the fall of 1980. The Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information, fully supporting the stance of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, made the following statement:

● (2200)

It was the strong opinion of the majority of the members of this committee that “quiet diplomacy” having failed it was now the time for the governments of the North Atlantic Alliance to pursue the policy of “greater realism” by taking a firm stance towards the Soviet-bloc governments in the implementation of the human rights clauses of the Helsinki Accords. We as members of democratic parliaments should be more outspoken in leveling just criticism where it belongs.

[Senator Yuzyk.]

A resolution adopted by the Assembly urged member governments to maintain “broad co-operation and consultation within the North Atlantic Alliance with a view towards developing a common Alliance position at Madrid.”

The Sub-Committee on the Free Flow of Information and People presented a lengthy report of its activities and recommendations, which were fully adopted by the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information. The chapter headed “From Belgrade to Madrid” deals with the Belgrade Conference, recommending firm and growing pressure on the governments of the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, but that care should be taken to avoid measures of doubtful use which might imperil peaceful co-existence between the peoples of Europe. Member governments are asked to start active preparation for the Madrid Conference in 1980, at which human rights provisions should be dealt with on the same footing as the other CSCE agreements.

A chapter on the implementation of the human rights provisions provides a detailed account of the implementation of Principle VII and Basket III provisions of the Final Act of the CSCE. Little or no progress has been made in these fields, except slightly in the re-uniting of families. There has been some improvement in East-West relations. The chapter on religion in the Warsaw Pact countries gives a country-by-country assessment of the religious situation, noting that anti-religious propaganda, harassment and persecution of believers continues in most of the communist countries, although some concessions have been made to church authorities in Poland, Hungary and Romania. The recent election of a Polish cardinal as Pope John Paul II will greatly affect the religious situation in the communist countries.

For the first time, a new chapter was included in the rapporteur's report. Under the heading “The Underground Press in the U.S.S.R. and Certain European Countries”, it notes that in contrast with the monopoly of the state over all forms of communication, a vast underground press, named Samizdat, meaning self-publishing, has grown up in the Soviet Union and its satellites; it fulfills progressively the same role as the free press in our democratic societies by drawing attention to the gap between the regime's policies and day-to-day reality.

This information was gathered from the archives of Radio Liberty in Munich and from three experts, General Petro Grigorenko and Ludmilla Alekseyeva, Soviet dissidents recently released from the U.S.S.R., and Dr. B. R. Bociurkiw, professor of Political Science at the University of Carleton, Ottawa, all of whom testified at the sub-committee meeting in Ottawa on September 8 and 9, 1978. The great present and potential influence of this underground press does not receive the attention that it deserves in the Western press. A better flow of information between East and West would make it possible to support more effectively democratic elements in Eastern Europe.

Great emphasis was placed on the vital importance of the quarterly publication, The Bulletin, the only public medium that constantly and intensely monitors the implementation of the humanitarian issues of the Helsinki Accords. Originating on a trial basis in 1976, the rapporteurs of the Sub-Committee on the Free Flow of Information and People have since then published 9 issues; in the last year it has become a quarterly publication. It is sent to members of the Assembly, interested parliamentarians, to international organizations, such as other North Atlantic bodies, universities and research institutes as well as to selected government offices and media representatives. Since the circulation has remained limited to about 500, an inquiry has been requested of each national delegation to the Assembly with a view to expanding the circulation of this important, informative publication that is one of the instruments which should be maintained with a view to the forthcoming review conference in Madrid.

The Twenty-fourth session of the North Atlantic Assembly attached paramount importance to the freedom of the press and of information as an essential and indispensable condition in any democratic system, to the strengthening of peace and international understanding and to the promotion of human rights. Information has become Western diplomacy's powerful weapon, considered in the East as a most dangerous threat to the Communist regime. This becomes obvious when we realize that the Soviet government spends more money jamming Western broadcasts than it does on its own international broadcasts and continues to exert political pressure to silence such stations as Radio Free Europe, Radio Liberty and others. Resolutions were passed urging member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance to increase the number of transmitters and to provide sufficient radio spectrum for shortwave broadcasting to the Iron Curtain countries.

Honourable senators, I believe that many of our colleagues in this chamber and readers of these debates might be interested in the full texts of the above-mentioned resolutions and also the others presented by the various committees and adopted by the Assembly. There are 10 resolutions, 5 recommendations and one order. With leave, I move, seconded by Senator Macdonald, that the texts adopted by the North Atlantic Assembly at its twenty-fourth annual session, Lisbon, November 25-30, 1978 be appended to the Debates of the Senate of to-day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For copies of texts see Appendix "C".)

Senator Yuzyk: I think that senators should be aware that Canadian parliamentarians in Ottawa have been actively involved in promoting and defending human rights. In June 1977, a Canadian Parliamentary Helsinki Group, chaired by the Honourable Martin O'Connell, was established on Parliament Hill, composed of members of all parties. It has heard briefs from the Canadian Committee of Captive European Nations and other groups, and has brought their requests to the attention of the Canadian government. It has brought to the attention of parliament matters related to the violations of human rights by the Soviet-bloc countries, has come to the defence of prisoners of conscience and dissidents, has worked actively for the re-uniting of families in Canada, has sponsored 18 parliamentary observers to the Belgrade Review Conference and sponsored a resolution nominating the five Helsinki monitoring groups in the Soviet Union—Moscow, Ukraine, Lithuania, Georgia and Armenia—for the 1978 Nobel Peace Prize. Since this was not realized last year, the United States Congress has recently re-nominated the same Helsinki Monitoring groups in the U.S.S.R. for the 1979 Nobel Peace Prize. It will be proposed that the Canadian Parliament follow suit in this matter soon. In order to achieve its purposes, the Canadian Parliamentary Helsinki Group approves not only "quiet diplomacy" but also "loud diplomacy" as expressed through peaceful public demonstrations of citizens, protests in the press and in parliamentary and legislative assemblies.

• (2210)

Since Mr. O'Connell has recently become Minister of Labour, a new chairman, Charles Caccia, M.P., from Toronto was elected in his place. Senator Jean Marchand and myself represent the Senate on the steering committee. Many senators are members of this group and all other senators are invited to join and give support to its positive, dedicated and unselfish work.

Honourable senators, in his speech last week, Senator McDonald proposed that in view of the Soviet threat to Western Europe, North America and NATO, a committee structure should be established in the Senate to study defence matters on an ongoing basis rather than as a one-shot affair.

Senator Allister Grosart was of the opinion that arrangements could be easily made to have the question of national defence referred to the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs as well as questions of external trade, foreign aid and immigration. International agreements and treaties should also be discussed in the chamber. The Senate, in his opinion, should have the right to ratify international agreements and treaties, which hitherto have never been referred to the Canadian Parliament. This also applies to policies of the government which are not enacted by legislation. Most second chamber legislatures, notably that of the United States, follow this practice. I endorse this idea. It is time that we adopted this practice. The Foreign Affairs Committee should commence in the near future to examine national policies in the mentioned areas, as we have the expertise and it would serve the best interests of our country.

I should like to conclude with an exhortation that the Senate should study in a systematic manner world affairs that affect Canada, our institutions and our way of life. In the defence of freedom and democracy, Canada must improve her commitments to NATO. Human rights and peace must be the cornerstone of Canadian foreign policy.

We should soon commence preparations to host the Twenty-fifth Session of the North Atlantic Assembly in Ottawa this coming October. Let us give an enthusiastic welcome to the delegations of the 15 NATO countries on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary which will manifest the solidarity of our democratic alliance.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to Senator Yuzyk. At the very beginning of his remarks he referred to the percentage of the gross national product which Canada invests in defence matters. He said, I believe, that it was about 1 per cent.

Senator Yuzyk: It is 1.8 per cent.

Senator Bosa: And then he referred to the Soviet Union and said it invests 13 per cent. Is that of the gross national product? Does that exceed the total allocation of the United States budget of defence, and, if so, what does that 13 per cent represent in dollars and cents or in rubles for that matters?

Senator Yuzyk: I believe Senator McDonald is in a better position than I am to answer that. He discussed this matter the other day. I understand that this figure of 13 per cent is of the gross national product, but there are a number of other hidden aspects of the budget that also deal with military affairs and defence. This leads us to believe that there is a much larger percentage of the budget designated for military purposes than we know.

Senator McDonald: Honourable senators, I am not able to give the figure in actual dollars as against rubles for the Soviet Union so as to compare the United States with the Soviet Union. I realize that the gross national product of the United States is one of the largest in the world, whereas that is not the case with the Soviet Union. The United States at the present time is spending just under 6 per cent of its gross national product on defence. As Senator Yuzyk has said, the Soviet Union admits to spending something between 13 and 14 per cent, but there are tremendous amounts of money in addition to that that are spent on defence matters in R & D that are hidden away in other activities of the government and that do not show up. I could not give you in actual or converted rubles what the comparison would be as between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Lafond, I move the adjournment of the debate until Thursday next.

On motion of Senator McDonald, for Senator Lafond, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FIRST MINISTERS ON THE CONSTITUTION

List of "Best Effort" Draft Proposals
With Joint Government Input Discussed
By First Ministers

(Draft Proposal Discussed by First Ministers)

RESOURCE OWNERSHIP AND INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

(1) (present Section 92)

(1) Carries forward existing Section 92

Resources

(2) In each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to

- a) exploration for non-renewable natural resources in the province;
- b) development, exploitation, extraction, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources in the province, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom; and
- c) development, exploitation, conservation and management of forestry resources in the province and of sites and facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, including laws in relation to the rate of primary production therefrom.

(2) The draft outlines exclusive provincial legislative jurisdiction over certain natural resources and electric energy within the province. These resources have been defined as non-renewable (e.g. crude oil, copper, iron and nickel), forests and electric energy. This section pertains to legislative jurisdiction and in no way impairs established proprietary rights of provinces over resources whether these resources are renewable or non-renewable.

Export from the province of resource

(3) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the export from the province of the primary production from non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the production from facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy, but such laws may not authorize or provide for prices for production sold for export to another part of Canada that are different from prices authorized or provided for production not sold for export from the province.

(3) Provincial governments are given concurrent legislative authority to pass laws governing the export of the resources referred to above from the province. This legislative capacity is in the sphere of both interprovincial and international trade and commerce. Provincial governments are prohibited from price discrimination between resources consumed in the province and those destined for consumption in other provinces. This new provincial legislative capacity applies to these resources in their raw state and to them in their processed state but does not apply to materials manufactured from them.

Relationship to certain laws of Parliament

- (4) Any law enacted by the legislature of a province pursuant to the authority conferred by subsection (3) prevails over a law enacted by Parliament in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce except to the extent that the law so enacted by Parliament,
- a) in the case of a law in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce within Canada, is necessary to serve a compelling national interest that is not merely an aggregate of local interests; or
 - b) is a law in relation to the regulation of international trade and commerce.
- (4) The effect of this new provincial legislative responsibility over trade and commerce diminishes the scope but does not eliminate the federal government's exclusive authority over trade and commerce. The exercise of the provincial power is subject to two limitations. First, the federal government may legislate for interprovincial trade if there is "compelling national interest". This trigger mechanism may apply to circumstances other than an emergency as established under the peace, order and good government power. Second, federal laws governing international trade prevail over provincial laws in international trade, in effect establishing a concurrent power similar to that for agriculture.

Taxation of resources

- (5) In each province, the legislature may make laws in relation to the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation in respect of
- a) non-renewable natural resources and forestry resources in the province and the primary production therefrom; and
 - b) sites and facilities in the province for the generation of electrical energy and the primary production therefrom, whether or not such production is exported in whole or in part from the province but such laws may not authorize or provide for taxation that differentiates between production exported to another part of Canada and production not exported from the province.
- (5) Provincial powers of taxation are increased to include indirect taxes over the resources outlined in this section—whether these resources are destined in part for export outside the province. These taxes are to apply with equal force both in the province and across the rest of the country.

Production from resources

- (6) For purposes of this section,
- a) production from a non-renewable resource is primary production therefrom if
 - i) it is in the form in which it exists upon its recovery or severance from its natural state, or
 - ii) it is a product resulting from processing or refining the resource, and is not a manufactured product or a product resulting from refining crude oil or refining a synthetic equivalent of crude oil; and
 - b) production from a forestry resource is primary production therefrom if it consists of sawlogs, poles, lumber, wood chips, sawdust or any other primary wood product, or wood pulp, and is not a product manufactured from wood.
- (6) In determining the scope of provincial legislative powers over resources exported from the province, it became necessary to define the degree to which the resource was processed. It is not intended to extend provincial authority to manufacturing but it is intended to extend it to something beyond its extraction from its natural state. Given the varying resources covered by this section, the wording of this subsection is thought to place the appropriate limitations on provincial powers.

Existing Powers

- (7) Nothing in subsections (2) to (6) derogates from any powers or rights that a legislature or government of a province had immediately before the coming into force of those subsections.
- (7) This clause ensures that any existing provincial legislative powers found in s. 92 are not impaired by the new section.

laws of Parliament

2. Any law enacted by the legislature of a province pursuant to section 1 shall prevail to the extent of the inconsistency over any law of Parliament enacted thereunder except in relation to Canadian content, Canadian broadcast programs and services, and technical standards, in which case any law of Parliament shall prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

Consultations

3. The Government of Canada shall consult the government of the province concerned before Parliament makes a law in relation to cable distribution within that province pursuant to section 1.

Telecommunications undertak-

4. Telecommunications undertakings coming under the jurisdiction of Parliament as well as those coming under the jurisdiction of the legislature of a province and engaging in activities coming under section 1 other than as carriers shall be subject, in so far as such activities are concerned, to the laws enacted under section 1.

Powers continued

5. Except where otherwise expressly provided in sections 1 to 4, nothing therein shall derogate from the legislative powers that Parliament and the legislatures of the provinces had immediately before the coming into force of these sections.

OFFSHORE RESOURCES

"On the question of Offshore Resources, the revised Constitution should provide concurrent legislative authority for Parliament and the legislatures of coastal provinces concerning the management of the offshore resources, lying adjacent to those provinces, which are within national jurisdiction, but which do not fall within the Provinces or Territories of Canada. This provision would be made without prejudice to the ownership of the resources in question.

Federal powers concerning navigation, international affairs, national defence and so on, offshore areas. Provision would also be made, however, for the application of various provincial powers, for example, concerning labour relations, to the offshore areas.

In describing the concurrent powers, provision should be made for federal paramountcy concerning international trade, environmental control, and other matters to be determined. Provincial paramountcy should apply to various aspects of associated onshore developments, and to other matters to be determined.

On the important question of the rate of exploration and of production, or more generally the pace of development, there should be federal paramountcy. However, in cases where the provincial government affected disagrees with federal proposals dealing with the rate of production, on the basis of anticipated adverse socio-economic effects, or adverse effects on the future availability of resources to meet the province's needs, such federal paramountcy would only be exercised in matters of great concern to Canada.

As a necessary complement to such provisions in a revised Constitution, suitable administrative arrangements should be worked out and confirmed in due course by statute, to assure continuing federal and provincial consultation and co-operation in the management and development of the offshore resources."

RECOMMENDATION 64

on political information and education (1)

The Assembly,

Recalling that Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty expresses the determination of member countries to bring about a better understanding of the principles upon which Western civilisation is founded and to ensure the preservation of this form of civilisation;

Recognising that our common heritage can only be safeguarded if our peoples are clearly aware of the values upon which their societies are based and of the need to defend them against external and internal threats;

Aware of the prime role of parliamentarians as the guardians of democracy;

Noting, among the publics of the Alliance member countries, much ignorance of contemporary political realities and increasing indifference to public life and the defence of the democratic order;

Convinced of the need to provide citizens with fuller and better balanced information on the problems connected with the defence of democratic systems and to give young people an objective view of national and international political issues so as to enable them to participate fully in the defence of their future;

Noting that political education is generally not provided for in the classical curricula of member countries;

Aware of the difficulties of such a task but persuaded that each member country can consider appropriate measures on a national basis;

Welcoming the steps already taken in several member countries by officially-backed specialised groups to promote the political education of young people and teachers;

(1) Presented by the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information.

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. organise active consultations on questions of information and education, in close co-operation with the Assembly and other appropriate Atlantic organisations, by inviting specialists from each member country to work with the NATO Committee on Information and Cultural Relations;

2. draw the attention of member countries to the present failings in the intellectual and moral defence of the Western world and to the need to reinvigorate cultural co-operation within the Alliance by inviting them to consult on this question at the political level and to review their information and education programmes;

3. support and co-ordinate the groups and bodies active in this area, particularly by providing them with the information, documentation and technical means to help them in their work.

RECOMMENDATION 65

on human rights (1)

The Assembly,

Considering that the continuing CSCE process is a useful instrument of East-West co-operation, even though the first CSCE Follow-Up Conference in Belgrade has shown that not all of its provisions, particularly those concerning the implementation of human rights, have been fulfilled;

Recognising that despite fluctuations in the process of détente positive results in the fields of human contacts and reunion of families have been achieved;

Considering that the member states of the North Atlantic Alliance should, within the framework of their policy of détente, insist upon the full implementation of the CSCE Final Act;

Recalling Resolution 68 adopted at the 23rd Annual Session;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. carefully prepare for the second CSCE Follow-Up Conference, scheduled for 1980 in Madrid, with the objective of reaching concrete agreements for the expansion of East-West co-operation in all areas, especially in the humanitarian and cultural fields, as well as in the exchange of information and reporting;

2. regard the implementation of human rights as a legitimate subject of concern for the international community;

3. review periodically the implementation by all signatory states of all aspects of the Helsinki Final Act;

4. fully exploit the possibilities presented by the CSCE Final Act and support the implementation of its provisions through broad co-operation and consultation within the North Atlantic Alliance with a view towards developing a common Alliance position in Madrid;

5. urge member states also to consult and co-operate with other relevant international organisations and with the governments of neutral and Warsaw Pact states.

(1) Presented by the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information.

RECOMMENDATION 66

on Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions (1)

The Assembly,

Convinced that the security of the member countries of the North Atlantic Alliance depends on an adequate defence capability and a policy of détente, and that negotiations on arms control constitute an essential component of the detente policy.

Noting that negotiations on arms control must include restraints on qualitative improvements in order to bring under control the technological arms race;

Recognising that progress has been achieved at the Vienna negotiations and that NATO's MBFR initiative of 19 April 1978 and the Warsaw Pact reaction of 8 June 1978 have improved the prospects of reaching an initial agreement;

Emphasising that an initial agreement would lay the foundations for further negotiations and for further stabilising measures;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. following the signature of a SALT II Treaty, place a higher priority on the MBFR negotiations in order that agreement on the basis of parity and collectivity may be reached as soon as possible;

2. ensure that the confidence-building measures specified in the Helsinki Final Act and related to the MBFR reduction zone be made mandatory and that additional measures, such as the prior warning of major military movements, are concluded;

3. ensure that those nuclear weapon systems, not previously subject to negotiation in either the SALT or the MBFR negotiations, are included in future negotiations and that the security interests of all NATO states are fully safeguarded.

(1) Presented jointly by the Military Committee and the Political Committee.

RECOMMENDATION 67

on the impact of advanced technology on ocean management (1)

The Assembly,

Recognising that several nations have extended their responsibility for fisheries management up to 200 nautical miles offshore; that as the Law of the Sea discussions progress, some nations will consider extending their regulatory influence over other activities a similar distance from the shore; and that some form of international management regime may be established for ocean areas more than 200 nautical miles from shore;

Nothing that the development of satellite surveillance technology, together with advances in airborne, ship and buoy ocean sensor systems, has provided the capability to gather a wide variety of data relating to the environment and to man's own activities;

Aware that ocean information retrieval systems at both national and international levels have not kept pace with the development of ocean data gathering systems;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council organise a conference with the participation of representatives of member governments and parliaments and of experts on sea management to:

1. review requirements for ocean data in support of national and international ocean management activities;

2. assess the current and potential capability of technology to meet such requirements;

3. evaluate the relative merits of national versus multinational management and control of such technology in its application to ocean management;

4. make recommendations to the North Atlantic Council regarding the development and management of technology in support of ocean management for the North Atlantic region, within one year of the initial conference date.

(1) Presented by the Scientific and Technical Committee.

RECOMMENDATION 68

on the need for increased support for the NATO Science Committee (1)

The Assembly,

Congratulating the NATO Science Committee on its sustained support for international scientific activities and particularly for its efforts at organising meaningful exchange programmes involving young scientists;

Concerned nonetheless at the failure of Alliance governments to increase their financial contributions to the NATO Science programme beyond the level merely necessary to cover rising costs to keep pace with inflation;

Stressing the need to devote particular attention to the present needs of Portugal and certain other Alliance countries, including Greece and Turkey, to ensure that they receive increasing support from NATO science programmes and particularly the Fellowships Programme, in line with their needs and the fact that compared with the more scientifically advanced Alliance members, they have suffered disproportionately in terms of national funding;

RECOMMENDS that the North Atlantic Council:

1. re-assess the funding of NATO science programmes to ensure that the programmes are allowed to develop at an expanded rate and to contribute more fully to members' scientific needs;

2. ask the NATO Science Committee to prepare a special study of the needs of the less developed NATO countries to ensure that they are able to participate more fully in exchange programmes to the encouragement of young scientists in these countries.

(1) Presented by the Scientific and Technical Committee.

RESOLUTION 76

on a joint Atlantic strategy for economic development (1)

The Assembly,

Recalling its Resolutions 44 to 46 on an improvement of the world economic order, its Resolution 32 on world monetary reform, and its Resolutions 18 and 31 on economic assistance among NATO member countries;

Reaffirming the crucial importance of securing maximum economic co-operation within the Alliance with regard to achieving a comparable level of economic development;

Aware of the relationship between political and economic stability, and the fact that economic decline may lead to social and political unrest and increasing extremist activities;

Regretting the differences between European and American members of the Alliance which have emerged mainly from protectionist measures and monetary problems;

Mindful of the economic difficulties of Greece, Portugal and Turkey and the still enormous economic gap between countries of an Alliance which should be built on solidarity and collective efforts;

Emphasising that world trade has been a strong factor in the growth of Western economies;

Noting that the income gap between the industrialised and developing countries is still widening;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to fulfil Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949, the recommendations of the Committee of Three of 1956 and the declarations of the North Atlantic Councils in Ottawa of 1951 and 1974, all of which stress the need for closer economic collaboration among Alliance members;

2. to improve the economic position and the international economic integration of its less fortunate members in Southern Europe by granting financial and other help, opening national markets for imports, and by encouraging investment to create new jobs in these countries;

3. to promote the reform of the world monetary system in order to provide world trade and the world economy with a stable framework of fixed but adjustable rates for currencies.

(1) Presented by the Economic Committee.

RESOLUTION 77

on the security of nuclear fuel supply (1)

The Assembly,

Recognising that the current policy of the United States Administration in relation to the supply of nuclear fuel to other countries has been designed to add further and more effective measures to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapon capacity;

Recognising the importance of Euratom for the development of nuclear energy in Europe;

URGES the United States and Euratom to start a dialogue aimed at:

1. strengthening their co-operation against the dangers of nuclear proliferation;
2. ensuring the continued and uninterrupted supply of nuclear fuel by the United States to Euratom.

(1) Presented jointly by the Economic Committee, the Political Committee and the Scientific and Technical Committee.

RESOLUTION 78

on shortwave broadcasting and the World Administrative Radio Conference of 1979 (WARC-79) (1)

The Assembly,

Noting that the Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations declares it to be the right of everyone "to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers", and that the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe calls for a reduction in barriers to the free exchange of people and ideas among the signatory nations;

Recognising that for many millions of people shortwave broadcasts are the primary source of uncensored news and information, and that the free flow of information is indispensable to understanding among nations;

Deploing the intolerable level of interference that has resulted from the over crowding of the radio spectrum presently available for shortwave broadcasts;

Recalling Resolution 67 against jamming of broadcasts adopted at the Twenty-Third Annual Session;

Considering that the WARC-79 is the last international conference to be held during this century with the power to redistribute the radio spectrum, and that pressures are already being exercised to restrict shortwave broadcasting through the decisions of WARC-79;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to incorporate in their positions at WARC-79 proposals to provide sufficient radio spectrum for shortwave broadcasting to alleviate the present intolerable level of congestion;

2. to press at WARC-79 for the right of all countries to be heard via shortwave without interference;

3. to oppose forcefully the positions of those non-NATO countries which would restrict in any way the free flow of information on the shortwave broadcasting bands.

(1) Presented by the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information.

RESOLUTION 79

on the freedom of information (1)

The Assembly,

Recalling that freedom of the press and of information is an essential and indispensable condition in any democratic system;

Considering that the free circulation of information is also essential to the strengthening of peace and international understanding and to the promotion of human rights;

Disturbed by the attempts made in UNESCO to restrict the freedom of the press in the international community;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to maintain their firm opposition to any attempt to hamper the freedom of expression and of information;
2. to do all they can to protect and improve working conditions for journalists and the information media, not only in their own countries but also in developing countries;
3. to support any steps designed to ensure public access to information and a number of different information sources and media, both nationally and internationally.

(1) Presented by the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information.

RESOLUTION 80

on terrorism (1)

The Assembly,

Noting with concern the increase in acts of criminal violence and political terrorism in several member countries;

Noting that terrorists threaten not only the safety of citizens but also the stability of democratic institutions, which they openly challenge;

Considering that the links between various terrorist groups, their international mobility and the passive or active assistance they receive from certain states give the problem a supra-national dimension which calls for an international response;

Considering that no democratic society can tolerate blackmail of this type and that governments of member countries must take effective steps to combat this menace and protect their citizens and democratic systems;

Aware that under no circumstances should measures which do not respect democratic rights and freedoms be adopted by parliaments;

Aware that certain governments continue to encourage and support terrorist attacks;

Recognising the importance of the agreements already signed between several member countries, notably measures against air piracy, and noting the actual dissuasive effect of these measures on the terrorists themselves as well as on the states which give them refuge;

(1) Presented jointly by the Committee on Education, Cultural Affairs and Information and the Political Committee.

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to step up their co-operation for the exchange of information, international surveillance, the co-ordination of legislation and mutual aid in judicial matters;
2. to use the consultative and co-operative mechanism of the North Atlantic Council to organize, when necessary, meetings of specialists with a view to planning joint measures to combat dangers of escalation and attempts to organize criminal action on an international scale;
3. to ensure the effective implementation of existing international agreements and to involve the United Nations in a convention on hostages;
4. to co-ordinate and support diplomatic action against governments which appear to encourage and support terrorism;
5. to make a thorough study of the social and cultural reasons behind actions of terrorists, with a view to finding the most appropriate preventive measures.

RESOLUTION 81

on arms sales (1)

The Assembly,

Believing that the arms trade frequently feeds local arms races, heightens regional tensions and jeopardises regional power equilibriums, thereby increasing the risk of local war;

Convinced that the purchase of arms by less developed states is a tragic waste of scarce resources, aggravating poverty within the developing societies;

Recognising that the United States and the Soviet Union as the major arms producers and suppliers bear a special responsibility in this respect;

Deploring the fact that the arms trade has become an important element in the East-West competition;

Acknowledging that the production and sale of armaments constitutes an important element in the economies of several member countries but convinced that a concerted and co-ordinated effort is now necessary in order to curb the escalating sale of armaments;

Convinced that since current Sino-Soviet tension impacts adversely on East-West relations and constitutes a threat to world peace, the Western response to present Chinese initiatives should be both prudent and responsible, particularly concerning the potential sale of armaments;

Noting that as yet there is no Western consensus on a China policy;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to press for greater co-operation among arms suppliers to co-ordinate arms export policies particularly on a region-to-region basis;

2. to demonstrate their support for President Carter's arms export policy by imposing similar restraints on their own exports;

3. to press for the creation of an international forum for the exchange of information and ideas on the arms market and its control.

(1) Presented by the Military Committee.

RESOLUTION 82

on military aid to Greece, Portugal and Turkey and on the Cyprus problem (1)

The Assembly,

Aware that the military strength of Greece, Portugal and Turkey bears directly and importantly on the security interests of the Alliance;

Noting the action of the Congress and President of the United States to lift the arms embargo against Turkey;

Noting, however, that the law pursuant to which the embargo was lifted requires that, before United States military aid and sales may be continued, the President must in early 1979 certify to Congress that the interested party has negotiated in good faith towards a just solution on Cyprus;

Recognising that a settlement in Cyprus is still not at hand;

Noting that the Federal Republic of Germany is granting military assistance to both Greece and Turkey and recently also to Portugal;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

- actively to encourage and facilitate the negotiation of a final agreement among the concerned parties regarding the Cyprus problem;

URGES governments of all European member states of the North Atlantic Alliance:

- to examine thoroughly the possibilities of granting military aid and to implement without further delay such military aid to Greece, Portugal and Turkey.

(1) Presented jointly by the Military Committee and the Political Committee.

RESOLUTION 83

on arms control (1)

The Assembly,

Concerned that an unrestrained strategic arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union would lead to a less stable and more dangerous world;

Persuaded that the failure to conclude an acceptable SALT II agreement will seriously damage the detente process and will increase political and military instability and insecurity;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to support United States' efforts to conclude a SALT agreement which is equitable, balanced and verifiable;

2. to press that further negotiations seek to bring about significant reductions in each side's strategic nuclear forces;

3. to press that these subsequent negotiations include the theatre nuclear forces deployed in and against the European theatre.

(1) Presented jointly by the Military Committee and the Political Committee.

RESOLUTION 84

on East-West relations (1)

The Assembly,

Concerned at recent developments in Africa, the Middle East and Iran and the harm these might cause the detente process;

Concerned at the Soviet military build-up in Europe and the new dynamics of weapons technology which might endanger arms control agreements;

Recognising the critical importance of the continued pursuit of detente for the stability of East-West relations and for the security of Eastern and Western nations;

Acknowledging the progress that has taken place in implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, but deeply concerned by the trials and sentences of Soviet human rights activists;

Believing there are many areas where co-operation with the Soviet Union can be pursued to mutual advantage;

Recognising that detente is a slow and laborious process whose development and limits need sharper definition and clarification;

Believing that economic co-operation with China and the active participation of China in world affairs is in the interest of peace and stability;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to support the efforts to seek peaceful settlements in the Middle East and Africa;
2. to encourage, in view of the CSCE follow-up meeting in Madrid in 1980, a common approach on political and economic co-operation with the East;
3. to press for arms control agreements in order to prevent a new arms race;
4. to develop policies towards China that are compatible with the process of detente.

(1) Presented by the Political Committee.

RESOLUTION 85

on measures to control maritime pollution (1)

The Assembly,

Concerned at the extent of environmental damage caused by the Amoco Cadiz tanker accident off the coast of Brittany in March 1978;

Recalling the Assembly's Resolution 63 of November 1976 urging member Alliance governments "to work towards international regulations of the sea routes used by large bulk carriers of hydrocarbon with a view to reducing the risk of accidents and their possible consequences for the coasts";

Regretting the continuing lack of progress to date on establishing an internationally acceptable code of maritime conduct to make less likely similar accidents, as well as the inability of member governments to cope adequately in initially preventing the risk of oil spills and in subsequently repairing the damage caused by oil pollution;

Recognising that many pollution incidents result from human operating error;

Recognising the importance of the work of the IMCO within the framework of the UN;

URGES member governments of the North Atlantic Alliance:

1. to stress to their delegations to the United Nations Law of the Sea Conference due to reconvene in Geneva in March 1979 the need for an international maritime code of conduct;
2. to work towards both an international ban on sub-standard tankers and a recognised training scheme in pollution prevention for senior tanker crew members;
3. to work towards improving (a) international co-operation both in legal terms and at the operational level and (b) national administrative structure and emergency procedures for dealing with future maritime pollution problems.

(1) Presented by the Scientific and Technical Committee.

ORDER 21

on a co-operative programme with the Atlantic Institute for International Affairs (1)

The Assembly,

Considering the importance of devoting careful consideration to the future military, political and economic problems of individual member countries and the Alliance as a whole;

Recognising the mutual benefits to be derived from co-operation with the Atlantic Institute for International Affairs on a programme of this nature;

INSTRUCTS its Secretary General; to take all appropriate steps to arrange a joint conference (or conferences) at a time and in a place convenient for participating parliamentarians and the personnel of the Atlantic Institute project.

(1) Presented jointly by the Economic Committee, the Military Committee and the Political Committee.

AIR CANADA

STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT REGARDING SALE TO PRIVATE INTERESTS—QUESTION

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, last Wednesday, February 14, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate by virtue of what authority the President of Air Canada, Mr. Claude Taylor, had stated that he foresaw the possibility that Air Canada might be sold, in total or in part, to private interests and providing special privileges for its employees.

The next day, that is Thursday, February 15th, the Leader of the Government in his reply told me that according to the information received from Air Canada, Mr. Taylor had based his assertion on the statement of the Honourable Otto Lang during consideration of the Air Canada Act.

Honourable senators, I checked the statement of the Minister of Transport and I am sorry to advise the house that the information supplied by Air Canada was biased and in no way justified the statement of its President, Mr. Taylor.

On the other hand, I know full well that it is not government policy to sell Air Canada shares either to the public or its employees. The statement of Mr. Taylor therefore constitutes an abuse in the exercise of his prerogatives and he should rectify the impression his statement left on the public opinion.

May I ask the Leader of the Government to convey the tenor of my comment to whoever supplied us with that distorted information last week.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have taken the opportunity to speak personally with the Minister of Transport with respect to this matter and I can confirm that the statement made by Mr. Taylor does not represent government policy. The original information was, however, provided through the auspices of the Department of Transport. The situation is being investigated further.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Does the government leader recognize that the information provided by the Minister of Transport was misleading? Or am I to understand from his answer that he agrees with Senator Marchand that the information which, as he said, was provided by the Minister of Transport, was incomplete?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the information provided was in no way false. It may have been incomplete but it was not false. The statement had been made by Mr. Taylor. Obviously it was a speculative, personal statement. It is not usual for presidents of crown corporations to elucidate or enunciate government policy.

Senator Flynn: But you said this was not government policy. What is government policy?

Senator Perrault: Government policy at the present time does not call for the sale of Air Canada to any other entity or individual.

Senator Flynn: That is definite? You are sure? You have that from the Minister of Transport?

Senator Yuzyk: Or perhaps from the Prime Minister.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND—POWER POTENTIAL OF LOWER CHURCHILL FALLS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have some information with respect to the development of hydro-electric potential of Labrador, in reply to a question asked on this subject by Senator Marshall on February 15, 1979.

On November 24, 1978, the federal government and Newfoundland signed an agreement to establish the Lower Churchill Development Corporation Limited. The primary objective of the corporation is to establish a basis for developing the hydro-electric potential of the lower Churchill River in Labrador. Study stage work will include evaluation of both the Gull Island and Muskrat Falls sites, study of the required transmission facilities, analysis of methods for financing the project and examination of prospects for marketing power from it, as well as assessment of the environmental and socio-economic impacts of the project on the region. The federal government has allocated $5 million for performance of the study stage work, which is expected to be completed by mid-1980.

The corporation is owned by Newfoundland, 51 per cent, and the federal government, 49 per cent. The board of directors of the corporation consists of six members appointed by Newfoundland, five appointed by Canada, and the chief executive officer. The chairman of the board of directors is Mr. Victor Young, Chairman of Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro. The Vice-Chairman is A. Digby Hunt, Assistant Deputy Minister, Energy Policy Sector of the federal Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

There have been two meetings of the board of directors to date, and they have established committees to select the chief executive officer, the financial consultant and the engineering consultant. Essential work on the environmental impact assessment is under way under the direction of Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro.

GRAIN

INITIAL PRAIRIE PRICES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on February 1, Senator Olson asked a question about the Canadian Wheat Board. The question was as follows:

What I am interested in is the date on which producers can expect an announcement, because in recent press releases the minister responsible for the Wheat Board has talked about a rather substantial final payment for the year that has just ended. He indicated that this had improved because export prices increased in the latter part of 1978. This fact would also have an effect on the amount that will be offered in the initial prices for the coming season. Could the leader obtain an early announcement respecting that date so that producers will know it in advance of seeding?

The reply is as follows. The minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board has made it a regular practice to provide farmers with the latest information about world production as well as Wheat Board minimum quota levels and initial prices prior to seeding so that producers can use this information in their seeding decisions. In keeping with this practice, the minister will announce minimum quota levels and initial prices on or about March 1 this year.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

EAST COAST FISHERIES—CANADA-FRANCE AGREEMENT—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on February 13 the Honourable Senator Marshall asked the following question:

Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Can he inform the house whether any discussions were held between the Prime Minister of Canada and Premier Barre of France, during the latter's visit to Canada, over the position of the two countries with regard to St. Pierre and Miquelon, and particularly with regard to the establishment of boundaries between those islands and the Province of Newfoundland-Labrador with regard to fishing rights, and also with regard to the establishment of the 200-mile limit, the boundaries surrounding, and the median line which has to be discussed as it reflects the views of both countries on this very sensitive issue?

No discussions were held between the Prime Minister and Premier Barre on the subject of Canada-France fisheries boundary negotiations in respect of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

• (1410)

The Honourable Senator Flynn asked a question on February 8 with respect to the interim fisheries agreement for 1979 for the area of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Canadian and French fishery authorities have reached agreement on allocation of quotas for various stocks in the area off St. Pierre and Miquelon for 1979, as between Canadian and French fishermen, taking into account traditional fishing patterns over previous years. The division of species, and so on, is not listed in the information that I have before me.

Senator Flynn: There is no division of the waters between Newfoundland and St. Pierre and Miquelon; it is only on a quota basis that the agreement has been reached, is that right?

Senator Perrault: I have been advised it is on a division of quotas rather than a division of waters.

STATISTICS CANADA

SUGGESTED APPEARANCE OF OFFICIALS BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the interest that has been shown by members of this house in the computation of the cost-of-living index. Would the leader consider requesting officials of Statistics Canada to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for questioning?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure the members of the committee will on their own initiative decide whether or not the interesting suggestion advanced by the honourable senator has merit.

AIR CANADA

STATEMENT OF PRESIDENT REGARDING SALE TO PRIVATE INTERESTS—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in line with Senator Marchand's question, could the government leader obtain from the Minister of Transport a statement on government policy regarding the possible sale of all or part of Air Canada's shares to the public? Also, in what way is the minister in disagreement with Air Canada's president, Mr. Taylor?

[English]

Senator Perrault: I am pleased to inform the Leader of the Opposition that I have requested just such a lucid statement from the minister in a personal meeting that I have had with him.

Senator Flynn: Let us pray.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, may I have leave to provide the information that was requested at the end of my presentation last night of Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act?

Senator Flynn: When the order is called.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order will not be called until tomorrow. Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: This mixes up our procedure.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have some information furnished under the following headings: physician manpower by province; payments on Health Resources Fund claims, which relates to a question raised by Senator Hicks as to the date for the final allocation of payments; notification to provinces, which relates to a question asked by Senator Smith (Colchester), and scientific community representation. I also have some tables of the submissions on hand as of November 4, 1978.

I have a table with reference to the first topic, which is physician manpower by province. The table was taken from the Canadian Health Manpower Inventory Publication, and gives information on the number of physicians and the ratio of physicians to population by province for the period 1968 to 1977. There is also a breakdown of the number of general practitioners, specialists, interns and residents by province for the year 1977. I regret that I do not have an analysis of the data giving distribution within each province, which touches on the question raised by Senator Marshall.

The second heading deals with payments on Health Resources Fund claims, which refers to the question raised by Senator Hicks. The payments—and I think this wording is going to be important, and Senator Hicks may wish to pursue this in committee—on approved projects will be made for eligible costs prior to December 31, 1980. That is where Senator Hicks obtained the date of 1980. But, claims may be submitted after 1980 for payment of eligible costs incurred prior to December 31, 1980. It looks as though it will turn on what is meant by "incurred." If they were incurred prior to that time, the payments can be made later. That might be an area Senator Hicks may wish to pursue with the departmental representatives when they appear before the committee, if the Senate refers the matter to a committee for study.

On the question raised by Senator Smith (Colchester) on the matter of notification to provinces, I can say that the provinces were notified by telex on September 8, 1978, that no further approvals were to be made for projects submitted under the Health Resources Fund Program. Senator Smith may have noticed that that was the original date in the bill. It was later amended to November.

Senator Flynn: Why?

Senator Frith: Because of a wish to extend the time to allow people to get their applications in so allocations could be made prior to November 1978, and, if that were so, payments could be made after that date.

[Senator Frith.]

Dealing with the matter of scientific community representation, I regret to say that we do not have a record of representations made by the scientific community regarding curtailment of projects approved under the fund. You will recall that a question was raised last evening as to whether representations were so made.

Honourable senators, I have a document entitled, "Draft Health Resources Fund Submissions on Hand as of November 4, 1978," and in this document there are six entries for Quebec. You will recall that in the presentation I made last evening I mentioned there was some inequity in distribution insofar as reaching the maximum amount for both Quebec and the Northwest Territories, so an attempt has been made to try to rectify this. The other two are for the Health and Social Services Training Project in the Northwest Territories, and the British Columbia Children's Grace Hospital located in Vancouver.

For Quebec it may be that one or more of the projects may be supported from the $3.7 million special allocation for that province, more specifically, QUE-124, Pavillon Marguerite d'Youville, Department de Nutrition. The same would apply to the $500,000 special allocation for the Northwest Territories on project NWT-3, Health and Social Services Training Project.

Honourable senators, with your permission, and because this material may be found relevant in committee and during the debate on second reading, it might be acceptable to append these tables to today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[For tables see appendix, page 603.]

Senator Frith: That is all the information I have.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I may have missed something Senator Frith said, because I thought my questions of last evening included one to the effect: Are there any projects known to the minister which would have come forward or which the provinces wanted to come forward but which had been barred by this deadline?

● (1420)

Senator Frith: I think I mentioned last evening that the only one I had instructions on was the one in British Columbia. I shall make inquiries to determine whether there are others and, if so, provide the Senate with the details. I apologize for not having that information for honourable senators this afternoon.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Honourable Senator Frith for something slightly more precise in relation to the question I asked.

He has told us that he knows of no representations by scientific organizations. I thought I said professional organizations of the health professions. Does the term "scientific" cover the professional organizations, or did I fail to make my question clear last night? I cannot say.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Forsey's question did quite clearly specify "professional," and I remember it as such. It is true that the answer with which I have been furnished does refer to the scientific community. I do not know whether that is meant to cover professional organizations. I shall seek a more precise answer of the departmental officials and make that information available during the course of debate on the motion for second reading or at the committee stage.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. A. Olson moved the second reading of Bill S-12, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-12, to amend the National Energy Board Act, deals almost exclusively with the rights of landowners and expropriation procedures in the event that a pipeline company and the landowner are unable to reach a negotiated agreement.

Before getting into the detailed explanation of the provisions of this bill, I should like to pay tribute to the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, and particularly to those members of the committee who diligently attended committee meetings and applied themselves to the problems giving rise to Bill S-12.

Honourable senators who know of the activities of the committee will be aware that the committee did in fact spend some five or six months studying these problems, starting with its study of Bill C-25 in the last session and continuing in this session to a detailed study of the subject of expropriation procedures and landowners' rights. It became apparent very early on in the proceedings that landowners' rights were not well defined, and even where they were well defined it was apparent that the law dealing with the expropriation procedures was very, very antiquated.

Under rule 55 only a senator has the right to present a bill to the Senate. There is no provision under which a committee may sponsor a bill. So, while I am the one sponsoring this bill in the Senate, I want to make it clear that the bill itself is the product of a good deal of committee work.

I am advised that while the bringing forward of a bill in this fashion may not be unique, it is something that has not happened often in the history of this house.

I am also pleased to acknowledge that last night Senator Sparrow presented Bill S-13, to control the importation of beef into Canada, a bill that falls into the same category; that is to say, it is a bill that developed as the result of the excellent work done by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. So I think this is something that the Senate can look forward to as a useful part of its activities.

Honourable senators, as I was saying a moment ago, it was clear to a number of the members of the committee that landowners' rights in dealing with pipeline companies who had been given a right to expropriate land, if necessary, were such that there was really no means of intermediate arbitration, and that left the landowners in the awkward position of either taking the pipeline company's offer for compensation or going to court, that is to the superior court of the province, to have the matter arbitrated. The problem involved is that very often it was only a matter of a few hundred dollars difference between the company's offer and what the landowner felt was reasonable and just, and when the landowner faced the cost or the risk of cost in taking the company to court, the amount of risk involved was much, much higher than the difference between the offer of compensation and what the landowner himself felt was right and just.

In addition to that, these situations where an order for immediate right of entry or a warrant for possession was sought from the court, because it could not be obtained from the landowner on a voluntary basis, often took several months to come to a conclusion and, in a number of cases, several years. I am not being critical of the courts in saying this, because very often it was not the fault of the courts; it was the fault of one side or the other who was not prepared to proceed with the matter. But we did find cases, and some cases today have been outstanding since 1976 for one reason or another. In this regard I am sure honourable senators will be interested in knowing that the Law Reform Commission of Canada looked at the expropriation procedures under the National Energy Board Act back in 1974, and there are many paragraphs that could be read into our record this afternoon reflecting what they had to say about these procedures. To sum it up in one sentence, the Law Reform Commission said that the landowner's position is untenable under the National Energy Board Act, and the reference from that act to the Railway Act.

I should like to put one other quotation on the record today, and that is a quotation from the Minister of Justice, dated November 7, 1969. The reason I think this is important is that for those senators who are not already familiar with the fact, the general Expropriation Act of Canada is not that which covers the expropriation procedures used in the matter of acquiring rights for a pipeline. The general Expropriation Act of Canada is used by the government only for the purpose of expropriating land for some public purpose, for such things as the National Capital Commission, the National Harbours Board, National Defence, and so on.

● (1430)

But when we talk about expropriation for a pipeline, that is an authority given to a private or public company—but certainly not a government agency—so that it can have the right to expropriate, if necessary, from landowners who are unwilling to sign an agreement.

This is what the Minister of Justice said when the government was bringing in amendments and updating the general Expropriation Act on November 7, 1969:

The legislation, if adopted by the House and the other place, will apply to all federal departments and to expropriations by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Capital Commission, the National Harbours Board and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. It will not, however, extend to inter-provincial railways or to private companies under special acts which exercise special expropriation powers.

This is the sentence I want to draw especially to your attention:

We plan to deal separately with these companies in the future.

Well, honourable senators, that is almost ten years ago. I don't want to blame anybody, whether this government or some other government, but the fact is that it has not been done.

Senator Flynn: Well, you should blame them.

Senator Olson: To be even more non-partisan, I should also draw to the attention of honourable senators that the reference in the National Energy Board Act to the old, antiquated Railway Act for expropriation procedures was indeed put in in 1959, when there was a different government of a different political label in office. Here again I am not being critical of the government of that day. In fact, it established the National Energy Board under some pressure, because it was urgently needed, but instead of spelling out a detailed regime of expropriation procedure it simply referred the matter to those provisions already contained in the Railway Act.

That act has not been amended at all since 1959. It is interesting to note, too, that an examination of the old Railway Act shows that many of the provisions in that act for expropriation purposes date back to the last century. Indeed, there have been no significant changes to that act since 1919.

I suggest that even when the National Energy Board was set up in 1959 it was probably inappropriate for pipeline acquisitions. But certainly the act has become even more antiquated since.

Honourable senators, the provisions that we have in Bill S-12 to update these procedures are based on precedents to be found somewhere in the laws of Canada or the provinces. Many of the provisions in these clauses of Bill S-12 were taken from the general Expropriation Act of Canada that was updated, as I said, in 1970. Many of the other provisions in the bill before you today were taken from provincial legislation. But they were not from their general expropriation acts for the most part but from their acts dealing with surface rights. In Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia and several of the other provinces there are separate acts dealing with surface rights. Indeed, they are usually called "surface rights acts." These acts are administered by surface rights boards. I suppose the reason is rather obvious: It is that they have had to deal with pipeline expropriations or pipeline matters; that is, giving a company the right to build pipelines. It is also fair to say that these surface rights acts have been amended from time to time up to and including the mid-1970s. Therefore it follows, in my opinion anyway, that this legislation in the statute books of the provinces is in many respects far more modern than the federal act.

Perhaps I might turn now to a brief but somewhat more detailed explanation of what is involved in the bill. At the outset I should say that we are amending in any detail only two or three sections of the present National Energy Board Act, and even those sections—sections 73, 74 and 75—are very short.

● (1440)

Section 75(1) of the present act simply makes reference to sections 145 to 184, and also section 186, of the Railway Act. In other words, the one short section makes reference to about 40 sections of another act which set out details of the procedure respecting expropriations. However, when we repeal that section, we have to provide a total procedure for expropriation, and that is why the bill now before us contains the number of clauses that it does.

The first matter dealt with in the bill comes under the heading "Determination of Detailed Route." The clauses under this heading concern the company that is applying to the National Energy Board for a certificate of public necessity and convenience to build a pipeline for the delivery of gas, oil or any other commodity. The company is required to present to the National Energy Board what is called a plan profile and book of reference—that is a detailed route, including surveyors' drawings, of where the pipeline will be.

The Northern Pipeline Act was passed during the last session. There was no provision in the Railway Act to provide that landowners along the way could have the right to be notified, or a period in which they could file objections to the location of the pipeline. That situation was overcome in the Northern Pipeline Act. Section 18.1 of schedule 3 requires that the pipeline company shall serve notice on landowners along the way, and provides that landowners have 30 days in which to make representations, or their objections known, to the Northern Pipeline Agency, which was also set up under the act.

It is provided in the bill that section 29.1 of the National Energy Board Act be amended so that any future applications for pipelines under the act will require a company to give notice to landowners and to provide 30 days for objections to be received by the National Energy Board.

Under section 29.15, referred to in the bill, we are setting up an arbitration committee. The section says that forthwith, after the approval of a detailed route, an arbitration committee shall be established. I should point out that the cost of that committee will be paid by the pipeline company, although that aspect is not provided for until some sections later.

The proposed arbitration committee would have a number of tasks to perform. Those tasks are spelled out, and I will draw the attention of honourable senators to the more important ones. It is an intermediate arbitration procedure that will be available to landowners. If a landowner has a disagreement with a pipeline company, he can refer the matter to arbitration without the necessity of incurring a great deal of court costs, legal fees and everything else that is associated with referring a matter to a superior court.

The arbitration committee can also deal with such things as surface damages after the pipeline construction has been completed. That provision was not previously available to landowners and is not included in the present provisions of the National Energy Board Act.

Another feature of the bill is that landowners shall be offered by the pipeline company either a lump sum payment at the beginning, for the right to put a pipeline through his land, or an annual rental for the use of that land for as long as the pipeline is there.

At present there is no provincial legislation providing for pipelines, and there is nothing in either federal or provincial acts which prevents a company from offering annual rental payments rather than one payment at the beginning. However, there is a precedent in that in both Alberta and Saskatchewan gas and oil companies can rent what they call well sites—that is, a few acres of land, usually from two-and-a-half acres to five acres, on which they can place their machinery while drilling the well. It has been a long time practice for companies to pay the landowner an annual rental or annual compensation for the use of the land. In 1972 Alberta made it a requirement that the amount of compensation be subject to review every five years. That is also provided for in the bill now before us.

Although, in regard to payments for easements for pipelines, this is a new departure—and therefore it might meet with some resistance from the companies involved, either because it is a new concept or some difficulty is found in terms of dollars and cents, or in the amount of nuisance or cost involved to the landowner—I believe that over the course of time it will be found to be of great advantage.

At present, if a landowner is to be fully compensated for all the damage done to his land, he has to think in terms of 40 or 50 years down the road. Pipelines that are installed under modern practices—I will not attempt to explain those in any detail—have an operational existence of probably 40 to 50 years; and therefore it becomes an almost unreasonable task for a representative of the pipeline company and the landowner to try to anticipate all the damage, loss and inconvenience that can occur over a period of 40 or 50 years.

We know that there could be very severe loss to a landowner if the pipeline is near an area that in future might be subject to urban development. I am advised that most regional planning boards require that a house may not be built within 600 feet of a high pressure gas line. At least one member of the committee said that that is also part of the CMHC requirements. Obviously, if those pipelines are in an area where that is a possibility, then the landowner would have to take all of those losses into account, because he is deprived of the use of his land for that purpose as long as the pipeline is there.

● (1450)

That, of course, is not the only problem. The fact is that the National Energy Board Act—I believe it is section 77—gives the pipeline the very highest priority in the use of that land once an easement is either negotiated or imposed by arbitration. In other words, the landowner does not have the right to build a road or put an irrigation ditch either over or alongside a pipeline. In fact, if you look at the section fairly carefully, you will see that the landowner gives up his right to decide what is going to be done within whatever distance from that pipeline is considered safe. The distance would obviously be much greater if he were going to put up a dwelling. It would have to be at least 600 feet away, according to some interpretations. Even if he had other buildings in mind, however, there would be a distance from that pipeline in which the landowner would be prevented from doing with his land what he would be able to do if the pipeline were not there.

We believe, therefore, that it is better for the pipeline company and the landowner to review the damage, or the possible damage, every five years, so that they can see what damages are actual, what can be projected, and what steps can be taken to prevent what might happen.

You will be interested to know that there are some damages becoming apparent from the operation of pipelines, such as the great TransCanada gas line, that were unknown 20 years ago, when many of these lines were put in. It could not be anticipated at that time, for instance, that losses would occur as a result of the injection of heat into the gas that is dissipated along the route of the pipeline. Such a thing had not even been heard of then. At one of the main compressor stations at Princess, which is inside Alberta but near the head of the TransCanada pipeline, they pump as much as 3 billion cubic feet a day through four pipelines. During the compression stage they also raise the temperature of the gas by about 20 degrees. The gas comes in there, I am advised, at a pressure of around 650 pounds per square inch. It is then compressed up to about 850 pounds per square inch, and during that compression process the temperature is raised about 20 degrees. That heat is lost by dissipation into the soil for the next 40 or 50 miles down the pipeline route.

Several things happen because of that unnatural heat in the soil, one of which is early germination of some varieties of grass and weeds, which is usually followed by a drying-out early in midsummer, so that the over-all loss to the farmer has some significance. I do not have with me the technical data that indicates it is only the heat that is injected into that soil, or dissipated through it, that is the cause of these phenomena. There are people who believe that the mixing of the soil from the surface down to 10 feet brings up certain soluble mineralization and leaves it on the surface. This mineralization is incompatible with the natural environment of certain plants that grow on the surface. In most cases this would be salts of different kinds.

It is easy to see that for a 56-inch pipeline they would have to dig a trench that is between 10 and 12 feet deep and about 6 feet wide. That brings up a large amount of soil from below the zone where the plants grow, and as careful as they may be to skim off the topsoil first and then put it back after the subsoil has been replaced, there is still a disturbance, and it is entirely possible—in fact, some people firmly believe—that this mixing of the soil has an adverse effect on plant growth for many years afterwards. It seems to me that it is only reasonable that there should be an annual payment, which is reviewed and adjusted every five years, to compensate for these kinds of damage.

Senator Rowe: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question before he leaves this particular topic. He mentioned that the prohibition distance from the pipeline would be 600 feet in respect of houses or other buildings. That means, I take it, that there would be a 1200-foot lane through the land on which the proprietor or owner could not put any buildings. In effect, he would be prohibited from putting up any buildings in an area almost a quarter of a mile wide. I am correct in that, am I?

Senator Olson: At the committee hearings one of the senators advised us that there were certain mortgage companies—and I think he mentioned CMHC in particular—that would not favour advancing a mortgage on a dwelling that was less than 600 feet from a high pressure gas line—and that, of course, would be 600 feet on each side. There are regional planning boards in certain parts of the country that have rules as to what they will approve, and give a building permit for, with respect to distances from high pressure gas lines.

Honourable senators, I have talked about the notification to landowners before mentioning the approval of a detailed route. I have talked about setting up an arbitration procedure—the arbitration committee. I just want to go quickly through the rest of the details here, because I hope that this bill will be referred to a committee for detailed examination.

The Expropriation Act provides for negotiating procedures in the event that a pipeline company and the landowner cannot reach an agreement. We have put that in here, in clause 75(1), so that there can be a 60-day period during which a third party, called a negotiator and appointed by the minister, tries to bring the two parties together so that they can settle any outstanding differences without going the arbitration route. If that fails, then, of course, the arbitration procedure follows. I might also say that if it appears that the negotiation procedures are not making good progress, the pipeline company may ask that the whole matter be referred directly to arbitration. The reason for that is very simple. It is only the arbitration committee that can issue an immediate right of entry permit, and until the case gets to them, of course, they will not be in a position to act. We certainly do not want to frustrate construction deadlines, and target dates, and so on, by having people in a position where they cannot go to arbitration and get an immediate right of entry if that is necessary.

● (1500)

We then provide for the arbitration procedure that I explained a few minutes ago, but we expect these arbitration committees will only stay in existence during the construction of a pipeline, and for as long after as is necessary to settle substantially all of the outstanding disputes.

Clause 29.2 provides for the termination of an arbitration committee by the minister. If there are some further outstanding issues that need to be arbitrated afterwards, the National Energy Board will have the authority to appoint three suitable persons to act as an arbitration committee. This will become important, too, in the five-year review process, because in the event that the landowner and the pipeline company are unable to reach agreement on what future annual rentals may be, then the National Energy Board would be in a position to set up a tribunal to arbitrate those differences.

We provide in clause 75.16 for immediate right of entry, although it is not quite that immediate. It does require 30 days' notice to the landowner before a right of entry can be ordered by the arbitration committee.

One other thing honourable senators will be interested in is that one of the clauses provides that an arbitration order shall carry the same weight with respect to enforceability as if it were an order of a court. This is provided so that, in the event the orders issued by the arbitration committee are not appealed to a superior court, the enforceability will be the same in any event. If an order is made for a certain amount of compensation and the company fails to pay it, the landowner would have no option but to take it to court for collection purposes. We think this is unnecessary, and that is should be enforceable.

Honourable senators, I believe this is a well-researched bill. We have looked at all the present statutory law in the provinces, and we have satisfied ourselves that we are not setting out on any new departure. There are some precedents somewhere in Canadian law for almost all the details contained in this bill. We believe it updates the law, and perhaps brings an element of justice to landowners in their dealings with pipeline companies that should have been brought a long time ago.

I would add that I think most pipeline companies have, in dealing with landowners over the years, been more generous than the law required them to be, but that still does not alter the fact that if they apply the law strictly and only up to the limit to which they are required, the landowner is in a very weak bargaining position with respect to them. This bill will correct that to a very large degree.

In conclusion, I wish to indicate that if this bill receives second reading I will move that it be referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, because we believe that in fairness we ought to provide an opportunity for so-called outside witnesses to be heard. I refer here to the pipeline companies, their associations such as the Canadian Petroleum Association, the Independent Petroleum Association, farm organizations like Unifarm, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and so on. If they wish to come and give us their views on what is contained in the bill I think they should have that opportunity. It is a fact, of course, that many of these companies appeared before the committee during the preparation of the bill, but now that the bill is in its completed form it seems to me that it would be only fair and just to refer it back to the committee so that these witnesses may be heard.

With those remarks, I recommend that honourable senators give this bill second reading and refer it to the committee.

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question? I was reluctant to interrupt him during his presentation. While speaking of the trench to accommodate the 56-inch pipeline, he mentioned the soil and intimated that it might not be possible to restore it to its former fertility. There are many precedents in Canada because there are many pipelines. Was the honourable senator speculating on this matter, or was he speaking from his experience and that of other landowners?

Senator Olson: I think a little of both, but mostly from experience. I have had drawn to my attention some loss of growth of cereal crops, grass or whatever, growing over a pipeline, where there was an initial burst of additional growth because of the deep cultivation, which after two of three years was followed by very much less growth. That is when we get to the speculative part. I do not have any technical data to prove it was caused by the soluble mineralization that was drawn to the surface and brought into the plant root zone, or by heat or some other factor. However, from observation it is quite clear that there is deterioration in the growth over these pipelines some time later on. I know of cases where the growth above pipelines that have been in the ground since 1958, and the growth over large parts of the rights-of-way, is substantially less than the growth on adjacent soil that has not been disturbed.

Senator Godfrey: I should like to ask the honourable senator a question. Last week, when I moved the second reading of Bill S-11, the Trademark Bill, 1979, I drew the attention of the Senate to the fact that some of the clauses were in italics because they were considered to be incidental monetary clauses and therefore could not be included in a bill which is first introduced in the Senate. For example, clause 36(e) is in italics, meaning it would be struck out later in a Senate committee, because it provided for the "awarding and payment of costs or security for costs." Senator Olson referred to clause 75.26 of Bill S-12, which says:

All costs and expenses incurred in the establishment and operation of an Arbitration Committee shall be paid by the company.

I am wondering whether any consideration has been given to whether or not that clause should be in italics, as was the similar clause in Bill S-11, and whether we have the power to pass it because it might be considered an incidental monetary clause.

Senator Olson: That was very carefully put in there so that it would be within the jurisdiction—if that is the right word—of a bill originating in the Senate. If it had not been in there it could be interpreted as a charge on the public treasury.

• (1510)

It is well known that a money bill that makes a direct or indirect charge on the public treasury has to be moved in the House of Commons, preceded by a recommendation from an appropriate minister. Therefore, the amendments to the act have been carefully drawn so that there will not be, as a result of these clauses, a direct or indirect charge on the public treasury. Therefore, all costs are made on the company.

The House of Commons or some minister may wish to amend this bill when it gets there so that some of the costs may be at public expense—for instance, the cost of the ongoing arbitration committee. That will be in existence all the time. I think it is appropriate that the pipeline company making an application should pay all the costs, including the cost of arbitration. If when that committee has gone out of existence—and there is provision for that—a dispute arises, it seems to me that that is an appropriate cost to be borne by the National Energy Board. We wanted to be careful not to put in a clause that would give cause for someone to dismiss the bill on technical grounds.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I rise to support the motion for second reading. In doing so, perhaps I will be permitted to give some further extension of the reasons which have been put forward so well by Senator Olson.

I wish to place before you the thought that the committee which drafted this bill is not, in the interest of having the bill accepted by other places or by other persons or organizations, the appropriate committee to examine the bill after second reading has taken place. Perhaps I will expand a little more on that as I go along.

The Senate, and the people who will benefit from this bill, owe Senator Olson a debt of gratitude for the energy, drive and keenness with which he has taken hold of this committee, and for recognizing the problem of compensation. It was a pleasure to work with him, and I think he has done the Senate credit. I have nothing but the most congratulatory words for the manner in which he conducted the business of the committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Generally, I am fully in accord with his views on compensation, although we might look at one or two minor aspects, and one major aspect, of it. However, I do feel, in order not to lose any of the advantage the Senate and the people the bill will assist might get, we ought to make sure that no stone is left unturned to ensure that when the bill goes forth from the Senate, it goes forth in the best possible condition, in an actual sense and in a psychological sense. I would be very unhappy, as I am sure all honourable senators would be, if the criticism were made, as perhaps might be the case if the bill goes back to the committee, that, after all, this is something that was put together by a bunch of people who had made up their minds that they were going to change this question of compensation, and it has never really had a good going-over by some neutral group.

The situation I think is even more difficult for the landowner than Senator Olson said. I think he was rather generous in his comments regarding the present situation. There really is very little to guide the court as to what the compensation should be and what factors should be taken into consideration in calculating it. As Senator Olson has said, the National Energy Board Act disposes of this question by saying that sections 148 to 184, plus section 186, of the Railway Act shall apply mutatis mutandis, which means in legal jargon, changed about to suit the circumstances.

The Railway Act, as Senator Olson said, is not, by any means a modern act. It is not, by any means in tune with a modern view of what should be done regarding compensation for property taken without the owner's consent. Indeed, the Railway Act says, for the guidance of the court—which is either a county court for the district in which the land is located, or if there is no county court, the superior court for that district—that the court shall take into consideration such matters as it thinks proper. In one sense, that leaves the widest possible scope, but in the other sense, it gives the least possible guide.

Senator Olson and his staff evolved a more satisfactory guide for the arbitration committee and, therefore, for any court to which the decision of the arbitrators may be appealed.

Clause 75.12(2) of the bill states:

An Arbitration Committee, in determining the amount of compensation payable for the acquisition of lands, shall consider

- (a) the market value of the lands;
- (b) the loss of use of the lands granted to the company by the owner thereof;
- (c) the adverse effect of the lands granted to the company on the remaining lands of the owner;
- (d) the nuisance, inconvenience and noise that may reasonably be expected to be caused by or arise from or in connection with the operations of the company;
- (e) the damage to the lands in the area granted to the company that might be caused by the operations of the company;
- (f) any special difficulties in relocation; and—

As is usually the case, the catch-all paragraph:

- (g) such other factors as it considers proper in the circumstances.

● (1520)

It then goes on to define the phrase “market value.” I am sure honourable senators will recognize the phraseology used. The phrase “market value” is defined as follows:

- (3) For the purpose of paragraph (2)(a), market value is the amount that would have been paid for the lands if, at the time of its taking, it had been sold in the open market by a willing seller to a willing buyer.

Senator Flynn: It has always been very confusing.

Senator Smith (Colchester): It is better than none at all, or at least I would be inclined to argue that it is better than none at all.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Smith (Colchester): It is some improvement over the present situation.

The bill then deals with a further matter of compensation which, so far as I can tell, is not one that receives very much consideration under the present law. The proposed section 75.13(2) reads:

[Senator Smith (Colchester).]

An Arbitration Committee, in determining the amount of compensation payable for any damages suffered as a result of the operations of the company, shall consider

- (a) damage to any lands of the owner, other than those lands entered upon, used, occupied or taken by the company;
- (b) loss of or damage to livestock or other personal property of the owner of the lands;
- (c) time spent or expense incurred by the owner of the lands in recovering any of his livestock that strayed due to any act or omission of the company; and
- (d) such other factors as it considers proper in the circumstances.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that that enumeration of factors is certainly a great improvement over the present situation. The act as it now reads merely says that the court shall consider such factors as it considers proper. Notwithstanding the fact that a good deal of jurisprudence has grown up around that phrase, surely this is a very substantial improvement.

There is another change which is not ordinarily found in compensation statutes, and this, doubtless, I should think, will be the object of some criticism by those who do not like the bill, if there are such people—and I am not suggesting that there are any in the Senate—and that is the point which Senator Olson referred to as the five-year review. Under that provision, if the compensation is chosen by the landowner to be taken in periodic payments, annual or otherwise, the amount thereof is to be reviewed every five years. That, I think, is something fairly new in terms of compensation provisions. I do not think it is unreasonable, but it is something on which we no doubt will hear some criticism.

I am not now trying to pick out everything that might be the object of criticism, but I think there is one further provision which requires further consideration, and that is the proposed section 75.23, which provides as follows:

- (1) An order granting a right of entry—

That is, a right of entry to the company.

—is deemed to vest in the company unless otherwise provided in the order the exclusive right, title and interest in the lands in respect of which the order is granted.

Once the right of entry is granted by the authority authorized to grant it, unless otherwise provided, the company gets what we lawyers call fee simple title to the land. It seems to me that it should grant only the easement required, or whatever it may be, unless something more is ordered.

Perhaps I have said enough on that point to indicate that I do support the bill and its contents; that I do support what Senator Olson has said about its merits and its improvement of the situation as between the landowner and the company or organization expropriating the land or acquiring an easement. I have not yet said very much about the other point, that being the question of which committee of the Senate should deal with this matter.

The Senate—and I am very glad to see it—is embarking upon, not a new course of action, but certainly a somewhat unusual course of action in light of the activities of this house, at least during the time since I have been a member. I think it is an excellent course of action. It is something we should have more of. I was glad to see Senator Sparrow introduce a bill yesterday—a bill which, like this one, is the result of very careful consideration and investigation of a certain situation by a committee of this house.

We are embarking on a different course from that usually followed. We are embarking on a course in which the whole Senate—and I join with Senator Olson in making this request—is being asked to produce a bill designed to remedy a bad situation, a situation which no one else has done very much about improving. It is a course for which we hope to win the favour of the government and a majority of the members of the other house.

It is not good enough to have the Senate pass a bill and then request the other place to get busy and do something about it. That is not going to help the situation. That is not going to help the landowner. If we are going to be helpful and effective, what we have to produce is a bill which will attract the attention, the sympathy and the support of the government and the majority of the members of the other house. I would like to think it would attract the attention and sympathy of members on all sides of the other house.

One of the steps the Senate could take to ensure that it puts forward the best possible bill is to have the measure carefully examined by a committee which has no preconceived ideas, a committee which has not, as I have—and I am sure other members of the committee have, too—a very strong conviction that what we are doing is the right thing and something which should be done.

I do not mind saying that I am in no great mood to change my mind on the contents of the bill simply because representations are made on behalf of someone who doesn't like it. I will be pretty hard to convince. Instead of being a neutral judge of the merits and the claims put forward, and any objections to the bill put forward, I will be a defender of the bill, and I suspect the Chairman of the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline, Senator Olson, would be too, as would any other member of the committee.

In that situation, those making representations in opposition to the bill will go away feeling that they simply did not get a fair hearing. We cannot say to those who are objecting that Senator Olson will be absolutely open-minded about this or that other members of the committee will be absolutely open-minded about it. Speaking for myself, I am not. I believe it is the right thing. I believe it ought to be supported. I believe it ought to be passed. No one objecting to the bill could possibly look on me as a neutral and impartial person judging their objections.

• (1530)

We have to persuade a government—and it may be one which has a greater insight into such things than the present one, but that is another matter—and we have to persuade a majority of the members of the other place. I think we would also like to have a pretty strong bond of public support for what we are doing and for the bill as one worthy of receiving the support of the government and the members of the other place. Therefore I say that while I hope and believe we will have all the prestige of the Senate behind this bill eventually, we want to make sure that there are no things left undone by the Senate which would make it more likely to be accepted and treated as a bill which deserves support, and make it more likely to be a bill which will be open to a minimum of criticism by those who may not like it.

So, honourable senators, while it distresses me greatly to have this difference of views with Senator Olson on a matter which has nothing to do with the substance of the bill, but only with the progress that we hope it will make, I still cannot refrain from saying that I think the Senate, if it is so minded, could do more to bring about the eventual success of this bill if it were to refer it for study to some other committee which would at least have the advantage of not having preconceived ideas already formed.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I cannot tell if Senator Olson wishes to conclude the debate at this time. But before it comes to that, I would like him to tell me if he would agree to have the bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs rather than the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am treading perhaps on doubtful ground since there could be a question as to whether I am in order or not in making an explanation at this time. But if honourable senators agree that I can answer the question I would say, as I said in my opening remarks, that I would prefer to have this bill sent back to the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline.

My reasons for that are very simple. The members of that committee are already familiar with the background against which the proposed amendments were framed. If that were to be the last stage in the examination of this bill before it became law, then I would have a much higher level of agreement with Senator Smith's arguments because I certainly agree that the special committee should not be the judge and jury in respect of its own work. But the fact remains that it is not the last stage. As a matter of fact if the bill should pass all stages, including third reading in the Senate, it will then be sent to the House of Commons where presumably it will go through the same process of first reading, second reading, referral, no doubt, to a committee where outside witnesses can be heard, and then return to the Commons for third reading before royal assent. So it seems to me that when there are so many checks and balances in the system with opportunities for outside witnesses and interested parties to be heard, it would be useful if the bill were referred to the committee whose members are already familiar with its background.

I want to make one further point in answering Senator Flynn's question, and that is that I think there is a much higher degree of flexibility and open-mindedness on the part of the members of this committee to make any reasoned and sensible amendment that outside witnesses may wish to suggest, and we would not have to go through the long process of familiarizing a new committee with all the background that this committee has acquired over the last five or six months.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that Senator Olson is not prepared to agree at this time that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, I am going to move the adjournment of the debate in order to consider the problems outlined by Senator Smith (Colchester) and some which I have just detected by glancing at the bill. Perhaps Senator Olson will change his mind by tomorrow, in which case we can give the bill second reading then, after which it can be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, February 28, 1979, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 27, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to give a brief outline of the business we will have when we return next week. In the Senate we will continue with the items on the order paper, and there are four inquiries which will probably be debated.

The committee schedule for next week is as follows. On Tuesday the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline will meet at 10 o'clock in the morning. I understand that this committee may also meet on Wednesday and Thursday; however, that decision has not yet been made. The Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution will hold an in camera meeting at 2 p.m., and the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will also meet at 2 p.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet in camera at 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will also meet in camera at 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-9, the Canada Referendum Act.

On Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-37, the Income Tax Amendment Act, and this committee will also meet at 2.30 p.m.

On Thursday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will both meet at 9.30 a.m. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY BILL

PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I hope that the Leader of the Government spent a good morning—I was going to say a good week—in Toronto. My question is with regard to Bill C-42, entitled, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979. I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government could tell me if previous consultations were held with the provincial governments, especially those more interested in the question of energy than others, before this legislation was tabled in the other place.

● (1410)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the bill which, with the co-operation of the opposition in the other place, we hope will be passed shortly, is really very similar to a bill that was before Parliament in the early seventies. That bill was never passed. It was, then, available for study by the provincial governments. The text is not new; indeed, the contents have been available for a considerable period of time. As I said, this bill is similar to the previous bill. As such, it is really not a new piece of legislation. The terms of the proposed legislation are well known to the provinces. That is why there is some federal lack of understanding of the reported concern expressed by at least one provincial government in the past few hours indicating that no legislative action should be taken by the federal Parliament in this matter unless there is prior consultation with the provinces.

Senator Flynn: Of course, the leader realizes that the previous bill was considered some four or five years ago. The circumstances were not exactly the same. The position of the Senate was not exactly the same at that time because it had not been criticized for failing to represent regional aspirations. Therefore, in the new circumstances, my question is very important and I should like a reply. Was there consultation just prior to the introduction of the bill?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Opposition is speaking of formal consultation with each of the provincial governments, that has not taken place. However, the reports overnight concerning the alleged objection entered by the Province of Alberta are being pursued by the federal government. I would think that federal officials will be in contact with officials in Alberta to determine the exact nature of the concerns, if any. The proposal is being considered.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Minister of Energy and Natural Resources of Alberta indicates that some of the provisions in the bill are not clear to Alberta, because all they have received recently, according to the minister, is a telex indicating that the federal government will move forward rapidly on this matter this week. Because the co-operation of Alberta is important in this matter, if not absolutely vital to the bill being passed, could the leader tell us if there is going to be consultation, so that Alberta will understand the totality of what this bill intends to do?

Senator Perrault: May I say that it was heart warming to see the reception given to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and members of his cabinet when they arrived in Toronto to hold their cabinet meeting.

Senator Flynn: What has that to do with the question?

Senator Perrault: It has something to do with the question in that at that cabinet meeting the only information available consisted of incomplete radio and television news reports. As of this morning, no formal communication appears to have been received from the Province of Alberta. Consequently, there was no formal objection for the cabinet to consider.

Senator Olson: Apparently the Province of Alberta received no formal notification from the Government of Canada indicating that they were going to move on this bill yesterday. According to the news reports, and I cannot guarantee their accuracy, they received a telex only yesterday about this, and that is where the confusion lies. It stems from this lack of communication. So all I am saying is that this could be cleared up if both sides were to get together and explain to each other what it is they intend to do.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is expected that the Honourable Alastair Gillespie will have a statement to make today with respect to the situation. But may I say that one of the advantages in having effective central government in this country, or in any country, is that when emergency situations arise, such a central government can take the actions necessary in the public interest. The matter of providing adequate energy supplies for the Canadian people is of vital importance to all provinces. In my view, conditions are such that this is not the time to convene a full-blown federal-provincial conference with respect to a situation that could become an emergency.

As I have said, it is expected that a statement will be made by Mr. Gillespie today. Certainly it is to be hoped that any problems with any of the provinces can be resolved.

THE CABINET

MEETINGS IN TORONTO—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government, in view of the great reception given to the Prime Minister in Toronto, if the cabinet met there in public?

SUGGESTED APPEARANCE OF OFFICIALS BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, pursuant to the question I put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate yesterday relating to having an official of Statistics Canada appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for the purpose of informing members of that committee how the cost-of-living index is computed, I discussed this matter today with Senator Hayden, who is chairman of the committee, and he informed me that the request has to emanate from this chamber. Would the leader advise me how I should go about causing such a request to be issued?

Senator Flynn: You could consult me too.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be pursued.

ENERGY

POWER OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO ACT UNILATERALLY—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, before I come to my main question which is about energy, I was wondering if the great reception afforded to the Prime Minister in Toronto today and yesterday would encourage him to do his duty and seek the verdict of the people on whether or not they want him there any longer as head of the Government of Canada.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there is every sign that very shortly the Canadian people will have the opportunity to exercise their right of freedom of choice at the ballot box.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Then, returning to the question of energy, and since we won't need much of it to deal with the other imminent problem, I am wondering if the Leader of the Government can assure the Senate that the government is satisfied that all the matters which purport to be dealt with in the bill we have just been discussing concerning energy can be carried out without the consent of the provinces.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government feels that it is proceeding in the correct constitutional fashion and on the basis of a perceived need and in the public interest. I may say that I am prepared to make a rather full statement on the energy situation, including reference to the Energy Supplies Emergency Bill, 1979.

Senator Flynn: The government did not think it could invoke the War Measures Act to deal with that energy problem?

● (1420)

Senator Perrault: That would be an action of a government of which you were a member.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: That is your solution.

Senator Flynn: The only time that the War Measures Act was invoked in peacetime was when it was invoked by the present Prime Minister 10 years ago.

Senator Perrault: With the full support of the Conservative Party.

Senator Flynn: Yes, because we believed that the government knew something about the situation. But the facts, when revealed, were otherwise.

Senator McIlraith: No, they were not.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Like many other people, members of the Progressive Conservative Party were misled by the incorrect and misleading statements that the government made at the time.

Senator McIlraith: That is not so.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Yes, it is so. In any event, while that is a subject that may be of interest to pursue, it is not why I rise at this point. I am sorry that the former Solicitor General seems so perturbed about it.

Senator McIlraith: I am perturbed. I do not think you should put on the record of this house falsehoods like that.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is not a falsehood; that is the truth.

Senator Perrault: May I say, honourable senators, for the record, that before that measure was invoked, there was full consultation with all the party leaders in the other place, including the then leader of the Progressive Conservative Party. There was full assent on his part when apprised of the information then available. The Progressive Conservative Party, as were other parties, was fully a part of the decision taken at that time.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Of course they were, but that is not the question. The question is whether the information they were given was correct, and I suggest it was not. I do not care what the former Solicitor General, for whom I have a great deal of respect and affection, may say about it.

[Senator Smith (Colchester).]

Senator Marshall: Don't get too nice.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Well, I like the guy.

Senator Flynn: We can't help but like him.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): We like you too, Ike.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Given the various turns the questions and answers on this subject have taken, I am not sure that I have had an answer to my question as to whether the federal government believes that everything that must be done to carry out the provisions of the bill concerning the rationing of energy can be done without the consent of the provinces. I do not believe the Leader of the Government answered anything like "yes" or "no" or "maybe" to that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I shall be glad to take the essence of that question as notice and provide a fuller explanation of the government's position at a later date.

QUESTION PERIOD

POINT OF ORDER

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I should like to rise to a point of order that I believe is of utmost importance to all senators.

Under the guise of asking an oral question relating to the subject of energy and the emergency that exists at this time, presumably to get information of interest to all honourable senators, certain statements were made concerning the use of the War Measures Act 10 years ago, and an assertion was made that is quite contrary to the facts and surely ought not be brought before the Senate in that form—

Senator Flynn: What form?

Senator McIlraith: In the form of a preamble to a question respecting the energy situation in Canada in 1979. To bootleg information like that into a question being asked during the Question Period constitutes irresponsible conduct. Statements put in that fashion can obviously not be dealt with in any answer to the actual question and are, because of the form in which they are put, harmful.

I would hope that honourable senators would address themselves in the Question Period to seeking information on government business and not take advantage of the Question Period to introduce remarks that are quite extraneous and foreign to the subject then before the house.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on the point of order, since it is insinuated in those comments that the opposition took advantage of the situation, I would like the honourable senator to look at the record tomorrow. He will see that the person who introduced the matter was the Leader of the Government, when he said that our party had used the War Measures Act. When I indicated it was only the present government, he said "With the approval of the Conservative Party." Therefore, I was entitled to say that we were badly informed. I am still convinced that we were badly informed. I do not mind whether the honourable senator is not in agreement with me. That is his privilege. But it is also my privilege to say what I have said.

Senator McIlraith: Continuing on the point of order, the record will, or course, speak for itself. There was no reference in my remarks to Senator Flynn's or Senator Perrault's comments. I made reference to the bootlegging of extraneous material in connection with a question by Senator Smith (Colchester).

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I will try to make my bootlegging more agreeable to the taste of my honourable friend after this. On the point of order, I say precisely the same as my honourable leader. We did not introduce the subject. The subject was introduced by the Leader of the Opposition—again I am looking ahead; I should have said by the Leader of the Government—in a completely extraneous and unnecessary way. If my honourable and well-liked friend feels that the Leader of the Government should be permitted to say whatever he likes, whether or not it is in order, without reply from this side, then I must say that I differ from him and differ most vigorously. He invited the reply, or the bootlegging, or whatever he wants to call it. I didn't think it was bootlegging; I thought it was a straightforward reply to an unnecessary and extraneous remark.

If, as I have no doubt is the case, the honourable senator desires—and quite rightly desires—to keep questions and answers to the point, I am with him, because it would be much simpler to ask questions and get a straightforward reply than to go through the charade we have to go through every day to get an answer from the Leader of the Government. If Senator McIlraith wants to help us conduct business properly, reasonably and according to the rules, perhaps he could persuade the Leader of the Government to answer questions, and answer questions only, during the Question Period.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not think that any good purpose is served by prolonging this matter. The record will certainly show that I did not initiate any discussion of the War Measures Act. It was done by the opposition. Secondly, may I say, in response to Senator Smith (Colchester), that I endeavour insofar as I am able, to answer questions as completely as possible in this chamber. I believe that the record is rather good in that regard.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I would like to read some of your answers, and we shall see if everyone thinks you are right.

Senator McDonald: Just because you don't get the answer you want—

An Hon. Senator: We don't get the right answers.

Senator McDonald: You don't ask the right questions.

Senator Flynn: You don't put any questions to him.

Senator McDonald: I know the answers.

[Later:]

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, before the Question Period ends, I wonder if I might be permitted to say a word or two. I am not sure whether I should call this a question of privilege or not, but I feel impelled to say something because I feel I was unkind and, perhaps unfair to a very estimable senator, Senator McIlraith. Senator McIlraith is one of the most distinguished and estimable senators we have. He was a perfectly innocent bystander when, by some unintended course of events, he got caught up in something to which he, I think, quite properly objected. I regret having caused any pain to such a distinguished colleague.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Roblin asked an excellent and constructive question on February 15 regarding the International Energy Agency and oil supplies, a matter of considerable interest to all of us. He asked about a body called the International Energy Agency, and whether Canada was a member of that agency. He also asked further questions on that subject.

Yes, Canada is a member of the 19-nation International Energy Agency. IEA member countries have agreed to the following four contingency measures with respect to a possible oil supply emergency.

● (1430)

First of all, each country must maintain emergency oil reserves equal to at least 70 days of net imports, rising to 90 days by 1980. Canada currently has emergency reserves well in excess of these minimum requirements.

Secondly, each country must have demand restraint programs in readiness that would be activated in an emergency to reduce its oil demand by 7 to 10 per cent.

Thirdly, the IEA will maintain an emergency oil-sharing system for the fair distribution of available oil supplies among member countries.

Fourthly, each country must establish a domestic emergency oil-sharing organization. The Energy Supplies Emergency Bill, 1979, toward which the Leader of the Opposition directed such lively attention a moment or so ago, specifically providing for re-establishment of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, fulfils Canada's commitment to the IEA to have in place adequate legislative authority to permit the imposition of mandatory control over the use and consumption of oil during an emergency.

So this action has been taken by the federal government in response to an emergency. I can hardly imagine, if we were in the process of being attacked by another nation or were about to enter a state of war, that we would find it a useful procedure to convene a federal-provincial conference and consult with all of the provinces over a month's period to determine what we should do. The government, under present circumstances, honourable senators, must demonstrate leadership, and this is what is being done. I am sure any difficulty with Alberta—if indeed any difficulty exists—can be worked out.

The International Energy Agency was set up in November 1974 by 16 oil-consuming countries belonging to the Organization for Economic Co-Operation and Development. An independent body within the OECD, the IEA carries out a comprehensive program of co-operation among its member countries. It is concerned with both long-term energy supply problems and possible oil supply emergencies. International tensions and domestic disturbances within oil-producing countries have focussed attention on the IEA's role in a possible oil supplies emergency. Contingency plans must be made to meet such an emergency. I have, of course, reviewed the four contingency measures that must be taken.

The emergency oil-sharing plan is activated when the IEA secretariat makes a finding that the member countries as a whole have suffered a reduction in oil supplies that could require a reduction in their average consumption of at least 7 per cent. In this event, each country restrains demand by 7 per cent and draws on its emergency reserves at a rate determined by agreement. The remaining oil is then shared among the member countries proportionately. If the supply reduction reaches 12 per cent the same procedure applies, except that each country restrains demand by 10 per cent. The plan works in a similar manner if a member country, or what is described as a major region of such a country, suffers a reduction in oil supplies that could require a 7 per cent reduction in consumption. Canada east of the Ottawa Valley and the eastern United States are regarded as so-called major regions under the plan.

If the emergency persists to the point where emergency reserves have been reduced by 50 per cent, the IEA countries would meet to decide further measures, including the level of demand restraint.

The plan would cease to operate when the IEA secretariat finds that reduction in supply to the member countries has fallen below 7 per cent. As an example, total consumption of the member countries is now about 36 million barrels per day. A 15 per cent shortage would reduce supplies to 30.6 million barrels a day. Since each country would reduce consumption by 10 per cent, the new consumption rate would be 32.4 million barrels a day. The difference of 1.8 million barrels between reduced consumption and the available supply would be made up by each country drawing on its emergency reserves at a proportionate rate. The oil thus made available would be distributed so that each country's net shortage would not exceed 10 per cent.

In the long-term, the IEA is dealing with a problem that could reach a crisis by 1985. Despite the development of North Sea, Alaskan and Mexican oil resources, the demand for imported oil could then exceed production by the member countries of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, known, of course, as OPEC. If, as some experts now predict, oil demand on OPEC for the world as a whole, including OPEC's demand for its own oil, increases to 42 million to 48 million barrels a day and OPEC production reaches only 36 million to 38 million barrels a day, there would be a gap of 4 million to 12 million barrels a day. Such a shortfall could mean sharp increases in oil prices, and possible serious shortages. The IEA member countries have agreed to hold the line on oil imports to 26 million barrels a day in 1985. Though the IEA does not establish targets for each country, members have announced their own targets, and these give a rough idea of how savings could be achieved.

To achieve group and individual objectives, the IEA member countries have committed themselves to 12 principles, which add up to a tough set of measures to encourage conservation, the development of alternative energy sources, especially renewable energy resources, and energy research and development. Each country's performance is reviewed against the guidelines annually, and, although there are no formal sanctions, these reviews have been candid, and in some cases harshly critical.

Of the 12 guidelines, only one, the commitment to develop nuclear power, is subject to reservations by some IEA members, mainly because they have not resolved domestic controversies concerning nuclear technology. Although some IEA members have reserves of coal, natural gas and hydroelectric power, as well as oil, nuclear power appears to be the only option for some.

The 26 million barrels per day target will be difficult to achieve, even with the best efforts, because it requires sacrifices now for benefits that will be realized only much later. A serious obstacle is the unwillingness of too many individuals in the industrialized countries to acknowledge that the problem is serious, and to conserve energy.

Honourable senators, I have taken some time in replying to this question because of its importance. I feel sure that if honourable senators require more detailed information, it can be made available. I direct that comment particularly to the Honourable Senator Smith (Colchester).

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his detailed information. Following up on his last suggestion, I wonder if he could give us the reviews of the International Energy Association insofar as they affect this country, so that we may see how they have regarded our adherence to the regulations they have laid down. I would be grateful to know if we may see those reviews.

I offer the passing comment that, in view of the fact that this started in 1973, it seems perhaps a little offhanded that we have only now got around to bringing in a bill to enable us on a statutory basis to carry out our responsibilities under this proposal, if my understanding of the situation is correct.

I also refer to a request I made the other day for a statement about our strategic reserve. I think I probably did not express myself too clearly on that occasion, because I was not thinking of the total reserves of the nation, which is one thing. I was thinking of the strategic reserve of oil in place in areas of use, such as east of the Ottawa river, because one would think that if we had to supply a 70-day reserve stock, it should be distributed in accordance with geographic necessity, and that certainly would be the case. I would be grateful for any information I can get on that point.

Senator Perrault: Most certainly that information will be sought.

COST-OF-LIVING INDEX—MEDIA REPORT OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be permitted to clear up a misconception that was created by the media in reporting me out of context, as having said that vegetables are a luxury. I did say that, but the reports did not go far enough. Honourable senators know that I meant that vegetables that cost $1.50 a pound or more are a luxury. It was only two or three years ago that filet mignon cost $1.50 a pound, and it was always considered to be a luxury. Just because I sit beside Senator Argue and close to Senator Olson, who are always pleading the plight of the beef producers, I hope that honourable senators did not think I was trying to influence them to switch from vegetables and become carnivorous because of what they have been saying.

Senator Perrault: The representatives from Prince Edward Island have reminded me in the past few hours that potatoes, regardless of their price, are always a magnificent taste luxury.

Senator Marshall: I do not think the Honourable Senator Bosa should apologize. I think it is quite an achievement for a senator to get quoted in the press at all.

Senator Flynn: Well, he is not complaining about it, I don't think.

LOTO CANADA

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON REPORT RELATING TO LOTO SELECT PROJECT—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, may I refer the Leader of the Government to the report he has just tabled from the Honourable Iona Campagnolo, Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, relating to the cost of winding up that unfortunate adventure described as Loto Select. I feel that in the interests of informing the public accurately he might suggest to his colleague that she amend slightly a statement that she has authorized for distribution in connection with this matter.

If you read the report itself you will see that the actual anticipated cost of settlement for the termination of Loto Select is $13,120,000, which, on a total estimated obligation, or liability, of some $60 million, is 21.45 per cent—almost 21½ per cent—of the original obligation of $60.7 million.

In the press release that has gone out in connection with this matter the minister has computed the cost at roughly 13 per cent, which is about half of what the true cost is, by the very convenient device of only counting the cost to the federal government instead of counting the whole cost of this adventure. Anyone reading this press release would think that the problem was resolved for 13 per cent of the total liability, whereas actually it was resolved for 21.45 per cent of the total liability. I hesitate to use such a strong and probably semi-unparliamentary word as "misleading", so perhaps I could call it creative bookkeeping. Whatever it is it is a new style of mathematics as far as I am concerned, and I suggest to my honourable friend that he might induce his colleague to set the record straight and give the public a more accurate impression of what has actually taken place.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there has always been a willingness on the part of the government and its spokesmen to state very emphatically that there are costs involved for provincial governments in this process as well. There has been a difficult negotiation with the provinces with respect to Loto Select, and under the circumstances I think it can be said that the minister responsible for Loto Canada has shown great skill and ability in negotiating the lowest possible—

Senator Flynn: Loss.

Senator Perrault:—cost settlement for both areas of government, federal and provincial.

As I recall the earlier reports broadcast from coast to coast in Canada, they were that this Loto Select process would involve a loss of $35 million to the Canadian taxpayer. The minister immediately denied that, and the facts obviously substantiate what the minister said on that occasion. However, the agreement which has now been achieved with the provinces, happily, will result in the successful operation of lottery plans, both provincial and federal, and ultimately the Canadian taxpayer and the Canadian people are going to benefit. I have in mind the possibility of substantial grants, for example, to the province of Manitoba, to assist in developing the hockey program there, both amateur and, I understand, professional, if Winnipeg is able to attract a National Hockey League team. It is better, surely, to have a successful agreement worked out between these levels of government than to have a protracted type of intergovernmental warfare with the taxpayer losing heavily on all counts.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I only wish that Senator McIlraith had been listening to this exchange, because if ever there was an example of successfully bootlegging information into a question and answer, we have just heard it. I congratulate my honourable friend for his verbal dexterity.

I do not know whether I should follow him down the trail he has laid out for me in connection with this proposed grant of $5 million for the Winnipeg auditorium, but it does illustrate the fact that like the Bourbons this government has learned nothing and forgotten nothing.

One of the complaints the provinces have been making with regard to the policies of the federal government concerns just this type of tied grant, this conditional grant, this interfering grant, by which they advance what they believe to be their own political interests at the expense of other people. In this particular case, if I have my facts right, the same minister, the Honourable Iona Campagnolo, said to Winnipeg, "We will give you $5 million provided the city will put up $5 million and provided the provincial government will put up $5 million and, what is more, provided the National Hockey League will give you a franchise."

I do not know what to call that kind of gift—there is an expression for it which escapes my tongue at the moment—but it is certainly a very peculiar type of undertaking that rests on four legs, as this particular stool happens to rest.

Senator Perrault: Do you oppose the grant?

Senator Roblin: I oppose the manner in which it is given. I oppose the linking of this matter with three other institutions that have nothing to do with the interests of the federal political party that proposed it, and I think the whole thing is a reprehensible example of the way you should not conduct federal-provincial affairs, and the way you should not promote sport in Canada, in any case.

I think that one can make a very good argument that if you have $5 million to spend on hockey there are other and better things to do with it than spend it on a National Hockey League team in Winnipeg, as much as I would like to see one there. I followed my friend far too far down the trail that he broke for me, but I do not see why he should complain, because he gave me the opportunity to do so.

What I would like to say to him, getting back to the point in question, is that I would have much more respect for the minister's capacities as a negotiator if I had the same respect for her capacity to transmit the facts to the public. When she implies in her press release that the cost is 13 per cent instead of 21 per cent, I think she oversteps the bounds of reason. When someone says that we should be throwing our hats in the air because it isn't $35 million but only $13 million, I am afraid that kind of argument leaves me somewhat unmoved.

I follow what I have to say, however, with a question to my honourable friend. Is it correct that the Auditor General is in the process of investigating this particular transaction?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, my reply to the final question of Senator Roblin is that I do not have that information before me. I know that the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport has been very open in all of the explanations and information she has provided with respect to that matter, and I think it highly likely that she would welcome that kind of study by the Auditor General.

Honourable senators, I cannot help but say that it saddens me when I hear this attack on fitness and amateur sport by the former premier of Manitoba. Here, in an act of unstinted generosity—

Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Perrault: —the federal government has extended aid to the Brandon Games, and we are very proud about that. There has been no reference at all to the aid given by Loto Canada to the Brandon Games, one of the most successful sports spectacles we have had in Canada for years. I find that very difficult to accept, and it saddens me. I see my distinguished colleague Senator Guay nodding his head in assent.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Flynn: On a point of order. I have no objection to this circus going on, but if you continue it, we will feel compelled to reply in kind.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I can only state that this attack on Loto Canada by the opposition is an attack on amateur sport from coast to coast in this country. It is an attack on the Mayor of Winnipeg, who supports this program and has hailed it. It is an attack on many people in the Government of Manitoba, who say that this is a constructive grant. It saddens me that a former premier would take this negative attitude.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if I had no sense of humour, I suppose I should not be on this side of the house but, actually, have you ever heard a more ridiculous statement than the one that has just been made?

Senator Flynn: Some of those he uttered before were just as ridiculous.

Senator Roblin: Yes, but I suppose you have to take them with a humorous slant of mind, because they were obviously intended to be funny. The point is that the attack is not being made on Loto Canada, although I would be glad to talk about that some day, because I have views on lotteries. The attack is not being made on Loto Canada—far from it. The attack is being made on the conduct of the minister and her policies which have resulted in someone's ante-ing up $13 million plus for nothing. That is precisely the point of attack.

• (1450)

I am not one of those who deny that the Brandon Winter Games were a great success. I know the Brandon people very well, and I know anything they undertake is going to be a success, and I am aware of the enthusiastic manner in which they adopted the games. Senator Guay will nod his head to that remark, I feel sure.

The Brandon Games have been a success and we are grateful for that. I am not going to make any bones about that. I simply say to my honourable friend that if he thinks I am attacking sport in Canada from the remarks I have made today, then obviously I have missed the target completely as far as he is concerned. I am not attacking sport in Canada; I am attacking the government and the manner in which they are managing things.

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES—PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT— QUESTION

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. Could the Leader of the Government inquire of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport whether she has received an answer from the Premier of Manitoba as to whether or not he agrees with the plan she has presented to him and to the city of Winnipeg for joint participation in such a program benefiting the people of Manitoba? If there is such an answer, I would be pleased to hear it.

Senator Perrault: I appreciate the question, and that information will be sought. However, I can convey to the members of the Senate a message provided to me by the minister, the Honourable Iona Campagnolo. The minister believes that all levels of government, including the Government of Manitoba, will benefit from tax revenues resulting from this arena. She feels that it will create new jobs that are badly needed in Manitoba at the present time, both in the construction and the ongoing operations of this arena. She states that a 15,000-seat arena in Winnipeg will attract national and international social events, amateur sporting events, and even political events. There are many positive reasons why the idea is something more than merely a sort of gesture which has been interpreted incorrectly as being designed for political purposes.

Senator Flynn: Would the leader, at the same time as he checks on the answer from the Premier of Manitoba, find out whether the initiative with regard to Quebec City did not come from a suggestion made by the Premier of that province?

Senator Perrault: I fail to see the relevance of that. The Province of Quebec, I understand, did suggest a three-way sharing of the cost of construction of an arena. I see nothing particularly germane in that. The federal government attempted to respond constructively to this suggestion, but made the point that if this kind of structure is to go ahead in the province of Quebec with federal assistance, then the same right should be extended to Winnipeg and other centres where similar conditions prevail.

Senator Roblin: This seems very much like that great waterfront park in Toronto that was probably promised again when my friend was down there.

While he is inquiring as to the views of the Province of Manitoba with respect to this matter, would he be so good as to find out whether any contact has been made with the Board of Governors of the National Hockey League to determine what they have to say about it?

Senator Perrault: I can inform honourable senators that a number of talks have taken place within the past two weeks with respect to possible expansion. I, for one, would welcome the admission of the Winnipeg Jets to the National Hockey League.

Senator Flynn: I am wondering if the federal government considers the suggestion made by the Premier of Quebec is part of the four-fifths of the PQ's program that can be accomplished within Confederation, or whether it is part of the one-fifth that can be negotiated?

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED MOVE OF CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION

Senator Marshall: Does the Leader of the Government have any replies to questions? I refer particularly to the request by many organizations, particularly the Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs not move the Canadian Pension Commission to Prince Edward Island for the reasons they suggested, and which I feel are justified.

Senator Perrault: A reply to that important question is in the process of being framed. I had hoped to have it, but it is not yet available.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Olson for the second reading of Bill S-12, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I merely wish to find out from the sponsor of the bill whether he would agree that this bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs rather than the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline. What I have to say about that will be more relevant at the stage of referral. If he accepts my suggestion, I will have nothing to say. However, if he does not accept that, I will have a few words to say on the motion to refer the bill.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I am not quite clear whether Senator Flynn wants me to reply now or at that later stage. I take it we can move to closing the debate on second reading now, and Her Honour the Speaker may take notice of the fact that I am rising for that purpose, if no other senator wishes to speak.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Olson speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have taken careful note of the remarks of Senator Smith (Colchester) and Senator Flynn respecting their concept that Bill S-12 is more in the nature of a legal bill than a pipeline bill. Perhaps, to put it even more precisely, it concerns the legal administration of pipelines. I have no disagreement with that concept, because almost all of the bill deals with expropriation procedures, which is a matter of applying the law. But, there are terminology and other practical applications of these legal matters that I think are somewhat unique to pipelines, although not exclusive. Because the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline has been involved in the examination of jurisprudence under the existing statute, and because it has interrogated a number of witnesses from the pipeline companies and other interested bodies knowledgeable in the practical application of these things, it seems to me that the members of that committee, who have acquired a great deal of experience in this matter and can move immediately into examining the outside witnesses, should deal with this particular bill. If the bill were referred to another committee, no matter how competent that committee might be—and there certainly are other competent committees of this chamber—they would, in fact, have to spend many weeks acquiring the same background knowledge that the members of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline have gained these past few months.

● (1500)

Having said that, I want to comment also on the remarks of Senator Smith (Colchester) who was the only other member of the committee to speak on second reading. Senator Smith exhibited great dedication to the work of this committee. He attended its meetings regularly when I know he had other high priority commitments, such as chairing meetings of the Transport and Communications Committee and attending others. I am particularly appreciative of the diligent application of his legal training to the kind of terminology used in this bill. That fact has certainly been helpful in our finding many ways to express in statutory language, if that is the correct term, the ideas we wanted to incorporate in this bill to correct some of the injustices that had been brought to our attention.

I do not really think, honourable senators, that there is a great deal more that I need say at this stage. If this bill receives second reading, I do intend to move that it be referred to the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline, and I imagine that will generate a short debate. However, the main reason I want to do that is so that the committee may hear interested parties or what are sometimes referred to as outside witnesses. At any rate, in this case they are very interested. I am speaking of people such as those representing the pipeline companies.

I should also mention that to date we have not heard any of the farm organizations who also have a great interest in amendments to expropriation law insofar as they affect their membership. They too have asked to appear. As I said, during the process of drafting this bill we did have advice from at least three of the major pipeline companies in Canada—TransCanada PipeLines, Interprovincial Pipeline Limited and Foothills Pipe Lines Ltd. Foothills, of course, is a company exclusively involved in the present planning and the eventual construction of the northern pipeline, but the sponsoring companies of Foothills, as honourable senators well know, are Westcoast Transmission Company Limited in British Columbia and Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company Limited. When they were here, of course, they gave us the benefit of their experience as well. So the bill was not drafted without advice from these major pipeline companies. But we certainly think that in fairness to them, now that the bill is in more or less complete form—and certainly it is subject to amendment, but it is in more or less complete form—we should provide an opportunity for them to come back to look at the bill and give us their comments on it.

I also want to say that at our meetings this year we heard only one so-called outside witness, and that was the Canadian Petroleum Association. But we had some indications, at least, that there were other parties who wanted to appear when the bill was completed. These are farm organizations and there may be some others too, although I am not at liberty to say positively who they are, who have an interest in where high pressure pipelines are located because of their effect on the adjacent land.

So, honourable senators, that would be the purpose of referring the bill back to the committee. I accept to some degree the arguments that have been made that nobody should be the judge and jury with respect to his own work, especially when it involves the making of law that will affect other people, but that is not the case where this bill is concerned. I say that because the committee will probably amend the bill—indeed I should be very much surprised if there were not some further amendments to it as a result of representations—after which it will return to this house for third reading.

Even that is not the end of it. As I said yesterday, the bill will go to the House of Commons where there will be other opportunities before a completely different set of personalities, if I may use that term, for these organizations to make their points if they are unable to persuade what may be termed a partially biased Senate committee—and I say that in the sense that we are the people who drafted this bill.

I want to assure honourable senators that insofar as I am concerned—and I think I speak for all members of the committee—we do not take the kind of pride in this bill that would lead us to believe we would be harmed if amendments were made to it. We have been extremely open about it, and we still are. Therefore, if any administrative problems or injustices can be demonstrated to us by pipeline companies, by farmers or by any others, we would certainly be wide open to suggested amendments.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Guay, that this bill be referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., seconded by Honourable Senator Guay, P.C., that this bill be referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I just want to put on the record my objections, which are not purely formal, to the referral of this bill to the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

My first reason, of course, is that it involves a problem that is exclusively legal. The sponsor said that it deals mostly with expropriation; I would say that it deals only with expropriation. Its purpose is simply to amend the National Energy Board Act in order to change the system of expropriation, which is provided therein, namely, the one under the Railway Act, to something which is close to the general expropriation legislation which was passed in 1970. Under our rule, such a bill normally goes to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and that was the committee which studied the Expropriation Act of 1969, which is now Chapter 16 of the 1st Supplement of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970.

The problems involved in Bill S-12 are problems that are purely and simply of a legal nature. I do not disagree that some people who are going to be affected by the construction of the pipeline, be they the companies or some people whose property will be expropriated, should be allowed to appear before the committee. But the only representations that those people would make to the committee would concern the principles to be followed in the expropriation, and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee would be the committee most qualified to deal with that aspect.

● (1510)

As Senator Smith (Colchester) mentioned yesterday, there is also some problem with the definition of "market value". Under the proposed section 75.12(3), the term "market value" would be defined as "the amount that would have been paid for the land if, at the time of its taking, it had been sold in the open market by a willing seller to a willing buyer."

I do not know that there is ever one who does not want to sell or one who does not want to buy. It seems to me we will have to have a better definition than that. In the province of Quebec, for example, that definition has been the test for real value as opposed to market value. Market value is probably the best price that one can find, whereas real value is something which is not entirely dependent on the market. I might say that the French version contains no reference to a willing seller or a willing buyer.

Dealing next with the matter of costs, there is a difference between what is proposed in this bill and section 39 of the Expropriation Act. I prefer the text of the Expropriation Act. Under this proposal, if the amount awarded by the Arbitration Committee is below 85 per cent of the amount offered, discretion as to costs rests with the Arbitration Committee. I do not like that. The only circumstance in which I feel costs should be denied the expropriated party is where the objection is found to be of a frivolous nature. On the whole, the expropriated party is entitled to the costs of preparing and presenting his case on top of any award. Again, this boils down to a purely legal question.

It may be, as has been suggested by the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, that his committee is too busy at this time to consider this measure. If that is so, I will not insist. This bill will not pass Parliament, in any event, until it is adopted by the government. As was pointed out earlier, some of the costs involved will have to be borne by the Crown. The bill, therefore, will eventually have to become a government bill. At this time we are discussing the principles which should apply to the expropriation procedures under the National Energy Board Act. We are all agreed that improvement is required.

To repeat, in my mind it would be more logical to refer this bill to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee; but if the Senate and the chairman of that committee prefer that it go to the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, I shall accept that. I point out that other cases will no doubt arise later on to which this legislation would have application, and which have nothing whatsoever to do with northern pipelines but some other expropriation falling under the National Energy Board Act.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition, in his very fair remarks, asked that I assure him that my committee, of which he is a valued and hardworking member, is too busy to deal with this measure at this time. The Leader of the Opposition knows that we have two matters now before us and that, to facilitate the operation of the committee, we have set up a subcommittee to deal with one of them.

As chairman, I certainly would not object to the Senate's deciding to refer this bill to the committee. However, should that be done, the Leader of the Opposition will have to assure me that we shall always be able to get a quorum for the three matters which would then be before the committee. If he could give me that assurance, I would be content, but I do not think it is possible.

Senator Flynn: Do you think I should be the one to give you that assurance? Do you not think you should ask that of the Leader of the Government?

Senator Goldenberg: I should say that insofar as obtaining a quorum for our committee meetings is concerned, we have never had a problem. I have always had the fullest co-operation of the Leader of the Opposition. But because of the small representation of the opposition in this house—which is something I do not favour—it would be difficult to have representatives of the opposition at meetings of the committee on all three matters. I learned just yesterday, in fact, that one of the very able members of the committee representing the opposition will be away for a month.

In closing, I will say that I, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, would never tell the Senate not to refer something to us; but if the Senate wishes to do so, certain conditions have to be satisfied.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, perhaps I might be permitted to say a few words at this time. I would like to begin by thanking Senator Olson for his very kind comments about me. They are much appreciated. His remarks were somewhat more generous than my conduct justified, but I am glad to accept them with thanks and appreciation. I trust my attendance will continue to be of some help to the committee.

One of the things I mentioned during the course of my remarks yesterday is the fact that I very much hope that the kind of initiative taken by Senator Olson in bringing forward this bill will be an initiative that will be frequently taken in the Senate. This procedure, it seems to me, provides an excellent opportunity for the Senate to engage in extremely useful work—work which other competent people do not have time to do. I want to see the pattern develop in such a way that people will continue to have a high regard for the Senate and its committees; that when a bill originating in a Senate committee passes the Senate, it will have with it the reputation of the Senate as a place that turns out only good and thoroughly considered bills—bills considered by the committees best qualified to deal with their subject matters.

Senator Olson has said, so far as this bill is concerned, that second reading and consideration by the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline is not the end of it; that there would be further consideration, such as third reading—and there really is not a great deal on third reading which has to do with the hearing of witnesses—and that it would also be examined by the Commons. If I thought he had any confidence that the bill would be introduced in the Commons by someone who had a chance of getting it through second reading there I would cease all discussion, and give thanks and say, "That's great." But I am concerned that if he does not have any such assurance, somehow or other there will be some excuse for those in the other place to say, "This bill has not been dealt with in the way we think it should, and therefore we are not going to introduce it," or "This bill has not been considered by such a committee." I do not think it will go forward without there being some opportunity, for those who do not want it to go forward, to criticize it and endeavour to prevent its introduction in the House of Commons.

Before it can be considered by the House of Commons, it has to get there, of course, and it may well be—I may be pessimistic about this; when Senator Olson replies, perhaps he will be able to put me right—that the fight to get this bill through is just beginning. If I thought that getting it through second reading here would guarantee its further progress after it left this house, I would be delighted and pleased and would no longer be concerned about the procedure we might best adopt.

I shall not press the matter further. Obviously, I must give consideration to the views of the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I shall not endeavour to overpersuade him and will say no more about it, but I want it to be very clear that I am not in any way being critical of the bill. All I am trying to do is to ensure that the bill has the best chance of progress that the Senate can give it.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to add a few remarks. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the comments of the Leader of the Opposition, and, under normal circumstances, I would be ready to agree to what he has said, namely, that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. But we are not dealing with this bill in normal circumstances. As has been explained by the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee—and I happen to be Deputy Chairman of that committee as well as a member of the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline—it would be quite difficult, in the present circumstances, for the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to give its immediate attention to the proposed legislation.

There would be the problem of getting a quorum in the split situation in which the committee presently has to operate. There would be the possibility of delay in the consideration of this bill due to the fact that members of the committee would have to acquire the kind of experience and expertise which members of the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline have acquired through weeks and months of study of the background of this suggested legislation.

As a matter of fact, I am sure that Senator Smith will agree with me when I say that to consider this proposed legislation means that we would have to start from scratch. I myself have no expertise whatsoever in connection with legislation existing in other provinces, particularly the prairie provinces, regarding expropriation for pipeline purposes—and the prairie provinces could be regarded as the region where great experience in that subject exists.

To comment further on the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, the bill, in addition to being based on the 1970 Expropriation Act, gets a lot of its inspiration and background from the expropriation statutes of British Columbia, Alberta and even Saskatchewan. This field of legislation was new to many members of the Northern Pipeline Committee, and it is new also to members of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. Therefore, if the bill is referred to the standing committee, it means that its members would have to repeat the study of the experience of the western provinces that the Northern Pipeline Committee made over the past few months. That would not help to speed this legislation through the parliamentary process.

No one, in either this house or the other place, can be sure that the bill will be passed in the current session, but if we further delay the bill here there will be less chance of its being considered to any degree in the other place. Therefore, we should do everything possible to expedite our consideration of the bill.

As the sponsor of the bill mentioned—and I am in full agreement with him—the purpose of referring the bill back to the committee where it originated is to try to obtain further evidence. That evidence will be obtained from the Department of Justice, from those companies that are interested in the construction of the pipeline, and from those who are likely to be directly affected by the expropriations. We shall gain fresh experience and be in a position to appreciate the evidence, having the background which we gained from several weeks of study of this matter. For that reason I support the motion of the sponsor of the bill, and I hope that it will receive the favourable consideration of this chamber.

Senator Olson: I do not wish to delay honourable senators for long, but there are at least two matters raised by the Leader of the Opposition and Senator Smith (Colchester) on which I should give at least a brief explanation.

First, Senator Flynn raised the point that before the provisions of the bill could become operative, the bill would, of necessity, have to be sponsored by the government. I would like to say that the bill is designed to be in order, insofar as the Senate's right to introduce bills is concerned. He will know as well as I that that limits, if not eliminates completely, the right to include a provision that imposes a direct or indirect charge on the public treasury. We have designed the bill along those lines.

[Senator Smith (Colchester).]

I realize that the bill calls for some administrative effort on the part of the government. For example, there are several sections which provide that the minister shall make appointments and issue orders. But we believe it is within the competence of the Senate to introduce what is contained in the clauses.

One further comment that I should like to make is that I believe the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution should take this matter under advisement, and perhaps recommend a change in the rules, if that is necessary, so that certain bills can properly be introduced in this chamber.

● (1530)

I am not suggesting that the Senate should be given the right to introduce either massive or minor financial programs. I think that is the responsibility of the elected government at any time. However, there have been many interpretations of the term "a charge on the treasury." Senator Forsey mentioned one day that a bill could be declared out of order because one of its provisions required the purchase of a few postage stamps. I hope that will be changed, either by practice in this chamber or, perhaps, by some arrangement to be worked out in the future, so that a bill could not be ruled out of order on the technical ground that it required the treasury to pay the cost of some administration. This, however, is a subject that I am not going to pursue here, because I think it can be pursued more properly by the Special Committee on the Constitution.

I should like to say something in reply to Senator Smith's remarks about the possibility of passage of this bill through the House of Commons. He said he would be very happy to see the bill introduced in the House of Commons, and I join him in saying I would be very happy too, especially if I had assurance that it would be expedited through that house. I do not think we can get that kind of assurance from anybody over there, because obviously we are dealing with a multiplicity of interests—both sides of the house, for example, and other party interests. However, I can assure Senator Smith that I have had a number of conversations with several members of the other house who are interested in and highly supportive of the provisions in this bill, and if and when it gets there I am convinced they will make it their business to promote its passage through that chamber as expeditiously as possible.

I can also say, without revealing the contents of the conversation, that I had a meeting with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Alastair Gillespie. He would not, and quite properly so, give a commitment that he was going to enthusiastically support every single clause in this bill, because he wanted to check the details of it with his officials, but I do not think I am telling tales out of school when I say that he told me he was both interested in and, on the face of it, supportive of these amendments. In fact, as long as ten years ago the government was considering the modernization of the expropriation procedures under the National Energy Board Act.

I cannot go any further than that, but I know there is interest there. It is quite impossible for anyone to suggest when this bill might be passed by the other place, particularly in these days when there is a lot of talk about dissolution. I will only say that I know several members there who are going to make it their business to promote the passage of the bill.

Motion agreed to.

BEEF IMPORT BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow moved the second reading of Bill S-13, to control the importation of beef into Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the Senate, on November 16, 1976, empowered the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture "to examine from time to time any aspect of the agricultural industry in Canada." The committee, not ignoring any other aspect of agriculture, believed that the important part of the agricultural industry that needed study at that time related to beef. Therefore, the committee shortly thereafter embarked on a study, holding hearings in Ottawa and throughout Canada, totalling 28 in all. At those hearings 31 briefs were presented by provincial ministers, federal ministers, producers and producer organizations, consumers and consumer organizations, and others. The hearings covered many aspects of problems in the agricultural industry, particularly in livestock production. The committee looked at production costs, marketing, product distribution, stabilization plans, marketing boards and other facets of the industry.

The hearings indicated that the most critical and pressing problem concerned the importation of beef into Canada, or, more precisely, the lack of effective rules pertaining to the importation of beef into Canada. Therefore, the conclusion reached by the committee was that the first stage in their report on the stabilization of the beef industry should reflect the problems of an import policy, or lack of it, within Canada.

That study resulted in a report being made to the Senate in October 1977 by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, entitled Recognizing the Realities: A Beef Import Policy for Canada. The report clearly defines the problems, and recommends actions to be taken to alleviate those problems. Bill S-13, introduced in this house on Tuesday, reflects very closely the recommendations in that report.

Uncontrolled imports of beef, or controlled imports without a firm long-term goal backed by legislation, has caused numerous negative results for the Canadian producer and consumer. At a time of expanding Canadian production, surplus beef products were allowed to come into Canada, and to come into Canada for a period of time at reduced prices. The reason for that, of course, was the surplus of beef throughout almost all exporting countries of the world. Basically, the only positive result of this importation of beef was a somewhat lower price to the consumer for a period of time, because it drove the price of beef down below the production costs of the Canadian cattle producer.

Such actions, in fact, resulted in quite a large number of cattle ranchers and cattle farmers being forced into bankruptcy. It forced others to sell off some, if not necessarily all, of their basic herd, which has created in the interval a very serious shortage of beef in this country, and a shortage of breeding stock within the beef industry. In the same period, over-production in the rest of the world created the same type of problem, and those producers have since cut back on their breeding stocks, which seems now to have created a shortage of beef production throughout the world.

This has caused as well what is possibly more crucial than the actual facts of the situation, and that is a reduction of the confidence of the beef producer of this nation. He felt that he was unduly harmed by the action or inaction of his government, when there were no firm guidelines established to protect him from exporting countries which, in many instances and for a number of reasons, were able to produce beef more cheaply.

What has resulted from this action and inaction is that our beef production has in fact dropped, and dropped drastically. That has happened because the law of supply and demand has forced the consumer in this period to pay higher prices than he has been used to paying. I believe those prices are high enough now to give the producer a fair return. In fact, there is a danger that ever-expanding beef prices may be getting close to the point where more profit is going to the producer than is actually required for a fair return on his investment.

As the price of beef goes up, the industry looks more attractive to such producers, and they believe that in the future prices will go higher, or will be maintained for at least a period of time, with the result that they hold back livestock from the market—that is, livestock in the form of breeding stock. Cows and calf crop heifers that would normally have gone to slaughter are held back for breeding purposes. This in turn further shorts the market, and causes the price to the consumer to go up.

We can expect that the holdback of this breeding stock will probably continue, for the next two or three years, which means that the market will be shorted in that period of time. We can expect, in my opinion, beef prices to the consumer to increase by as much as 50 per cent, and I believe the consumer should be protected from this at some point. We did not take action two or three years ago, and we are seeing the results of that inaction today.

Beef is one of the most important industries in the Canadian economy. In the farm sector it is second only to grain as far as the income that it generates for the agricultural community is concerned. The meat packing industry is the third largest industry in Canada. It is next to the automobile and small appliance industries in terms of total sales and wages. It is estimated that 12 per cent of the gross national product of this country is contributed by the red meat industry. From these facts it is easy to recognize how important the beef industry is in the Canadian economy. For this reason, therefore, Bill S-13 has been presented for consideration by this chamber.

[Senator Sparrow]

What does Bill S-13 provide? This bill is a comprehensive and detailed piece of legislation that takes into account and balances the interests of Canadian producers, Canadian consumers, and foreign suppliers of beef. The major provisions in the bill include quotas on all beef imports, minimum guarantees of access to Canadian trading partners based on average annual imports from 1967 to 1974, and annual adjustments in the import quotas to be made on a counter-cyclical basis, taking into account increases and decreases in Canadian population and consumption and increases or decreases in beef production. There is also provision for an adjustment of quota levels to protect consumers against unexpected and unusual price increases, together with provision for an import permit system to be administered by the Minister of Agriculture.

Under clause 3 of the bill quotas will be established for beef that will be allowed to be imported into Canada, and a breakdown of quotas, or quota pounds, for each country that during the base period was an exporter of beef to Canada.

As an example, New Zealand exported to Canada an average of 71 million pounds of beef during the base period of 1967 to 1974. To adjust this quota to increases on a percentage basis to Canadian consumption, to increases in population, and to increases or decreases over a given period in Canadian production, the quota for New Zealand for 1979, under the provisions of this bill, would be 83 million pounds, or an increase of 12 million pounds. I quote these figures to assure the consumers of this nation that through this bill we are making an effort to see that there will be increases in beef importations into this country both to assist them and protect them against undue price increases. Such increases would, it is hoped, not hurt the producer, and certainly not hurt the historical importer of beef into Canada.

Clause 7 contains a provision whereby the minister may, after consultation with consumer and beef producer organizations, recommend to the Governor in Council that a signal price per pound of beef be established for a category or a group of categories of beef. This signal price would be arrived at each year after determining what is fair for the consumer, and what is fair for the beef producer of this country.

If at any time during the year the average price per pound of beef has, for a continuous period of 60 days or more, exceeded that signal price, the annual quota for that year may be modified, or increased, to an amount not exceeding 30 per cent of the annual quota that had previously been established. No more than 30 per cent of the annual quota, or the annual quota as modified, after the signal price has been reached, can be imported into Canada in any three-month period. This, of course, will protect the producer from any great influx of beef in a short span of time.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, may I state that Canada is the only important beef producer in the world that does not have some form of mechanism for restricting the importation of beef. I recommend this bill to you, hoping that you will study it closely, and that you will attend the meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, to which, if it receives second reading, I will move that it be referred. I know that that committee will look at the details of this bill, and I certainly remain open to amendments that improve the bill and, in turn, benefit the consumers. I believe this bill commends itself to all facets of Canadian society.

Senator Steuart: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Senator Steuart: Why was the period from 1967 to 1974 chosen as the base period?

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, the years 1967 to 1974 appeared to the committee to be a representative period of time when Canada was both a net importer and net exporter of beef. We felt that period of time would be fair, not only to the producers and consumers of the country but to exporting countries as well.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 27, at 8 p.m.

Senator Langlois, for Senator Perrault, presented Bill S-14, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency.

Bill read first time.

Senator Langlois, for Senator Perrault, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POLICY RESPECTING HOSTILITIES BETWEEN CHINA AND VIETNAM—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Leader of the Government. What action is the Canadian government taking, either at the United Nations or through the relevant embassies, to bring about a cessation of hostilities between China and Vietnam?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I shall have to take that question as notice.

FISHERIES

CATCHES BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 29—By Senator Marshall:

1. Does Canada, under the Department of Fisheries, keep records of the tonnage of fish (by species) caught by foreign countries that have catch quotas under ICNAF arrangements through bilateral agreements?

2. If the answer is yes, what is the tonnage caught for the years (a) 1974, (b) 1975, (c) 1976 and (d) 1977, on cod, haddock, hake, halibut, herring, sardine, salmon, tuna, clams, crab, lobster, shrimps, oyster, seals, whales, and other seafish and shellfish not specified, by metric tonnes?

3. What is the breakdown by metric tonnes and dollar value of fish by species imported in the years 1970 to 1976?

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

1. Catches by foreign countries in the International Convention for Northwest Atlantic Fisheries (ICNAF) area are reported to the ICNAF Secretariat. These data are reported monthly on a preliminary basis and prepared yearly in final form. Since Canada's extension of fisheries jurisdiction, foreign fleets are required to report weekly to Canadian authorities their catches made within the 200-mile fisheries zone.

2. See Table 1.

3. See Table 2.

BEEF IMPORT BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald, for the second reading of the Bill S-13, intituled: "An Act to control the importation of beef into Canada".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Senator Macdonald: I yield to Senator Roblin.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, Bill S-13 presents to us a rather interesting initiative on an important public matter. I should like to offer my congratulations to the sponsor of the bill, Senator Sparrow, for his interest in presenting it to the Senate.

If one had to summarize the import of this bill in one sentence, I think one would probably say it is a bill about the price of beef, and everybody knows that the price of beef is an important issue in our affairs today. There has been ample evidence in recent times to indicate that the erratic nature of the supply, demand and price situation has presented the country with a rather vexing and disrupting economic problem. There are those who think that the present price of beef constitutes a "rip-off" by the agriculture community, and there are those at the other end of the spectrum that regard the price of beef as a beneficent operation of the law of supply and demand.

Be that as it may, the Anti-Inflation Board indicated in a recent report that during the past 12 months we have been afflicted with a rise in the price of food of some 21 per cent, which is reported as being the largest increase in any 12-month period on record and is, obviously, a major factor contributing to inflation and those problems associated with the consumer price index.

The analysis of the Anti-Inflation Board goes on to indicate that beef prices are a principal component of the food index, and that the beef price index itself has risen during that same 12-month period of which I spoke by 62.6 per cent, which is certainly astonishing. It is more than the increase in the price of fruit; it is more than the increase in the price of vegetables, flour, or any other item which goes into this calculation.

The effect of this impact of the price of beef on the cost of living is certainly significant. It has an effect on the pressure for wage increases, and I do not think it is going too far to say that its effect on the general course of the economy is considerable. We have seen in recent events a working-out of the beef supply-demand equation which has provided us with severe fluctuations which are adverse to many and of benefit to few.

An important point to keep in mind when thinking of the price of beef is that it depends, in large measure, on one of the plain facts of the natural order, that being that cows are subject to natural laws. It takes some 24 to 27 months from the birth of a calf to the time you get beef on the table. During that two-year period, the cattle breeder has to bear the risk or, in some cases, the advantage of price fluctuations which he finds very difficult to predict, with the result that when prices are low, and when he thinks they are likely to continue to be so, herds are rapidly reduced as he tries to respond to the price signals he is getting.

Indeed, in recent years the price of beef reached such low levels that there has been a substantial reduction in the very breeding herd itself, the consequences of which we have yet fully to experience. Unfortunately, when beef prices start to rise again, the supply cannot be increased nearly as fast as it was reduced as a result of falling prices. This, of course, is a natural consequence of the laws of nature with respect to the beef-calf cycle. As a consequence, we have seen violent changes in beef supply and beef prices.

It is of some interest to me to note that in 1977 the domestic production of beef amounted to 105 pounds per person, whereas in 1979, two years later, it is estimated to be 90 pounds per person—and we know what has happened to prices in that two-year period because of this decline in beef production per person. The increase has been astronomical. When I tell the chamber that the estimate for 1981 is for a further decline in the domestic production of beef to 82 pounds per person, a decline of 20 per cent over the four-year period I am talking about, it is easy to predict that the price of beef will go even higher and that we will probably continue to experience a wildly fluctuating demand-supply price relationship.

The consequences of this situation are not very attractive. In the first place, it tends to lead to inefficiency in the beef industry itself. The "in-and-out" characteristic which we are accustomed to, particularly in the cow-calf sector of the beef industry, leads to uneconomic operations and is costly to farming efficiency. Secondly, it is very expensive to the farmers themselves, particularly those who are forced to liquidate their herds at ruinous prices at the bottom of the cycle and who are barely able to recoup their losses at the top of the cycle. Some producers are hurt more than others.

Thirdly, the consumer, to say the least of it, is frustrated by the swings, especially on the high side of the cycle. While he may not be aware of the fact, he also has to pay for some of the built-in inefficiencies that arise from its very erratic nature. The consumer and the producer, between them, carry those costs. The Canadian economy, the fourth element in my analysis, is strained, because when one factor in the food component of the cost-price index goes wild, then other major economic factors, such as wages, react to the pressure.

There are certain remedial measures which the public authorities have been dealing with in connection with this beef cycle. Unfortunately, they do not seem to be working very well. We have, of course, the Agricultural Stabilization Act, one of the aims of which is to stabilize the price of slaughter cattle by invoking a price support formula. Without going into the details of that formula, I think it may be said that, as far as the beef producers are concerned, it is their view that this act is not doing very much to help them. Certainly, it does not seem to have done very much through the present cycle.

We protect Canadian markets from imports from abroad in two ways. First of all, there is a tariff, which amounts to 1½ cents per pound on live cattle and 3 cents per pound on meat. I might observe, as a matter of interest, that this level of protection is significantly lower than that enjoyed by beef producers in the United States, or in Japan, or in the European Economic Community. We also have to take into account a fact brought to my attention by Senator Beaubien the other day, that being that with the Canadian dollar at a discount of about 17 or 18 per cent, the Canadian beef industry today has an additional protection amounting to an ad valorem duty of about 17 to 18 cents on the dollar, which certainly is something which has to be taken into account.

The second way in which government acts directly to support the beef industry of the country is by the operation of a quota system. In this system we have a mechanism for limiting beef imports into the country. The sources from which these imports come, by and large, are the United States of America, Australia and New Zealand. The beef industry, however, has maintained—and I think with some degree of accuracy—that this quota is set in a rather erratic and ad hoc manner, and that it is done by ministerial discretion. There are a couple of ex-ministers here in the Senate who can certainly put me right if I am not stating this correctly. Operating behind closed doors, it is said, produces a quota which is unpredictable in its timing and magnitude, thus adding to the difficulties of the beef industry in trying to protect the future.

But the point of referring to these present protective measures, and the point of particularly mentioning the quota system is that it is on this very point of quota that Bill S-13 comes into action, because the central principle of this bill, if I have analyzed it correctly, is to set down in statutory form the rules and regulations by which beef import quotas are to be set. In addition, it is to provide a joint government-producer-consumer system of consultation to ensure that quotas are not only reasonably protective of the producer, but also reasonably just for the consumer.

Quotas under this bill are set by a formula that is to be publicly enshrined in the law. Among the factors to be taken into account are the population of the country, the consumption of beef on a per capita basis and the net production of beef by the beef industry. These measuring rods are all related to the imports of beef into the country for a selected base period, 1967 to 1974. It is on this basis, with the guidelines for quota setting clearly defined, that the quota is to be established from time to time as the factors and the indicators change.

The hope is that this formula will be sufficiently flexible to help producers when prices are low and to open up imports when prices are high. It is for this reason that the bill also provides for the establishment of a system of trigger prices. When prices reach an agreed level—which will undoubtedly be rather high—a consultation will take place between the government, the producers and the consumers, in order to open up quotas, increase supplies and relieve the pressure on prices.

I would not like members of the Senate to think that this bill is without its problems. I think it does have problems, and we would do well to acquaint ourselves with them. I think we have to consider how this bill bears on our trading relations in general. We know that we are engaged in discussions called the Tokyo Round, by which new trading relations between nations are being established, and we know that in this context international trade is a very important factor. I, for one, had no idea as to how this round might affect the principles enshrined in this bill, but it is obvious that before it becomes the law of the country we have to be sure that it is compatible with whatever international undertakings we have given.

Secondly, I think we should be aware that this bill impinges on our trading relationships with the United States as well, because a good deal of our cattle trade internationally has to do with the live cattle that are traded with the United States. For example, we send a good many feeder cattle from the western plains for finishing in the various parts of the United States, and import fed cattle into eastern Canada as a return trade.

We have to be sure that our trading relationships with the United States are considered in dealing with this bill. There is, indeed, a section of the cattle industry that views with some apprehension the suggestion that live cattle should be included in the quota arrangements. We know we have had problems with this in the recent past, and there may well be problems in the future. I express no opinion on this matter because I do not consider myself sufficiently well informed to do so, but I do think it represents a factor that should be taken into account.

The third problem area that one can foresee is the acceptability of the trigger-pricing concept as we attempt to reconcile consumer interest with producer interest. Undoubtedly this is a very difficult task indeed. I myself am rather attracted by the novelty of this trigger-price concept in connection with the matter we are discussing, and I am sure that it is one on which other interests will wish to express opinions from time to time.

I do not think we would regard this bill as a solution to the problems of the cattle cycle, or a complete answer to taming the beef cattle cycle. I do think, however, that it might be an interesting and useful step along that path. It aims to formalize the beef import quota system and, by making it a relatively public operation, to reduce one element of uncertainty in the beef industry. Certainly I think that there are many people in the beef industry who would hope that that would be the effect.

We might also hope that it would do something to improve the Canadian supply-demand relationship while, as I have said, making accommodation to consumer interests. If by these means we can get a stronger supply at steadier prices and a more efficient beef industry, then we will be doing something very much worthwhile, and I think the producers and the consumers and the public interest generally will benefit.

I believe that this bill comes to this house well recommended by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, and I think it merits sympathetic further study by this house as a whole so that we may examine its detail and resolve any difficulties that we may find in it. On balance, honourable senators, I would recommend this bill for your favourable consideration.

On motion of Senator McDonald, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.—(Honourable Senator Forsey.)

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I am sorry that I have had to ask to have this item stood twice, I think, or three times because of circumstances over which I had no control—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Forsey, would you move the adoption please?

Senator Forsey: I am sorry, honourable senators, my wits are getting addled.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Forsey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Argue, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Forsey: I start now with two apologies instead of one. I regret the more that I had to ask to have this matter stood, because it has enabled the House of Commons to get ahead of us and to adopt, I think unanimously, the report which is now before us. I hope that will not lead any honourable senators to feel that this is an occasion when we ought to display our independence, assert our independence, by taking a contrary action.

I hope to be brief on the subject of this report. I hesitate to emulate the Honourable Senator Laird some years ago and say it is a simple matter, because that turned out to lead us into a morass, a vast Serbonian bog from which we extricated ourselves only with some considerable difficulty.

Some honourable senators may feel that it is perhaps inopportune to present a report of this importance just now. Tennyson speaks of "... one far-off divine event, to which the whole creation moves." I suppose there is a certain feeling among some members of the house at least that at the moment there may be a certain not very divine, perhaps not very far off, event to which the whole Canadian political creation moves and that, therefore, to introduce a report of this magnitude at this stage is highly inopportune and perhaps foolish. To that my answer would be that the committee is well aware of the improbability, to say the least of it—I remember Arthur Meighen saying to me, "In politics never say 'never',"—but the improbability, to say the least of it, of the committee being able to act upon this report in the present session.

What we felt was that, if the report were adopted now by both houses, it might serve as a guiding light, a beacon, an inspiration for the new Parliament. In my own case I feel a certain sadness in this connection, because I shall not be here to have anything to do with it. I feel almost like saying with the gladiators in the Roman arena, "Moriturus te saluto." But we do feel in the committee that the report which we have presented here might well be the subject of fruitful labours by the joint committee when the new Parliament assembles. I hope that the joint committee in the new Parliament will have the good fortune to be looked upon with a kindly eye by whatever government is in office—whether the existing government or a rejuvenated Liberal government, or a government of the opposite party, or possibly a minority government of one party or the other, which conceivably might be a little more open to suggestions than members of a majority government sometimes are.

Well that, at any rate, is the reason why we are presenting this report even at this stage of the life of Parliament. It is, of course, conceivable that this Parliament may be allowed to run its full term and expire by efflux of time on the 31st of July; but that seems highly improbable. Only those on the front benches opposite will have any idea of the probability or improbability of that, and even they, some of them, may still be in some doubt. It is possible that the date of the dissolution reposes in the cranium of the Prime Minister alone, and it is even possible that he has not yet made up his mind.

I see an expression of extreme impatience on Senator Grosart's face, so I shall indulge in no further persiflage but get right down to the matter of the report.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear.

• (2030)

Senator Forsey: Ha, ha. It is not often you get any kind of applause in this chamber, and I may be tempted on future occasions to angle for it in the same way.

The first thing I want to say about this is that until the MacGuigan report, a few years ago, there was really no kind of provision for control over delegated legislation at all. That was a great first step. It was a most important, comprehensive, profound and valuable report. The existence of the present Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is the result of that report.

I don't think that all the recommendations of the MacGuigan report were fully embodied in the Statutory Instruments Act, but a great number of them were and we have now some means at least of exerting parliamentary control over the enormous and vastly and speedily increasing mass of subordinate legislation.

The second step, of course, was the creation of the present joint committee. And while I don't want to be immodest about its achievements, I think it has accomplished a certain amount in the way of establishing parliamentary control over delegated legislation. Some departments have been particularly co-operative—have been particularly open, to use a cant phrase that is very popular now—a cant word that is very popular—have been particularly ready to accept the suggestions of the committee. Others have been less so, so that our record is somewhat spotty. But I think we have achieved a certain amount. We have also succeeded in putting before both houses certain general propositions based on a multitude of cases in certain of the reports that we have submitted, notably our famous or infamous second report of a session or so ago.

But I am sorry to say that our experience has led us to feel that our present terms of reference are not really adequate, because a great many of the recommendations that we have made have produced very little effect. This has been particularly true of recommendations which we have made, as it were, to the government itself. A most notable example of that, of course, was when the government increased the postal rates simply by executive action and we drew attention to this, suggested that the action was of doubtful legal validity and suggested that it was certainly a highly improper way of proceeding. That report was unanimously adopted by both houses. It was unanimously adopted in the other place, with several ministers sitting there blandly accepting the report. I suppose one might say that they were asleep at the switch perhaps. But the report condemning what the government had done sank like a stone into a barrel of tar. It just slowly disappeared from sight. The government paid absolutely no attention and proceeded to announce that it was going to raise the rates again by exactly the same procedure as before, saying that it had an opinion from the Department of Justice that this was perfectly legal, which, of course, evaded the main point that we had made: that it was a highly improper method of proceeding.

The government has introduced a bill which will retroactively remove doubts of the validity of the action taken—the executive action taken in, I think, two increases already and will arm the new postal corporation, or the minister, or some personage or body with the power to do exactly the same thing again in future without any doubt whatever of the validity or propriety arising. That legislation, of course, has not yet come before us, let alone gone into effect, but it is evidently something which the government hopes will come into effect which will clear its skirts of the charge of possible invalidity of these regulations and certainly of their propriety.

That was a particularly conspicuous example of the way in which our recommendations have been, in important regards, ignored. Our plea for a clarifying amendment of the definition of a statutory instrument has also gone unheeded except that the government, I think, invited us to act as parliamentary draftsmen ourselves and produce a satisfactory amendment. And, of course, the impenetrable obscurity of that definition has been one of the most serious obstacles in the way of our doing our work.

Well, our experience then has not been altogether happy. We have felt that we were not in possession of adequate powers to exert the kind of control over subordinate legislation which Parliament clearly must have intended in passing the Statutory Instruments Act. And we have been fortified in this conviction by the experience in Great Britain and the powers of the joint committee in Great Britain which performs similar functions—there is also a House of Commons committee which deals with certain particular instruments—and by the experience and the powers of the Senate committee in the Commonwealth of Australia.

Over the Christmas recess the co-chairman, Mr. Baldwin, went out to Australia. He was going for other purposes, I think, and took this in on the way at, I think, no cost whatever to the taxpayer, incidentally. Mr. Baldwin had a series of interviews with people engaged in the process of drafting regulations and statutory instruments in Australia and with the members and officials of the Senate committee there. He came back with a most startling report for us, indicating that in Australia the powers of the committee were vastly greater, not only on paper but in fact, because the draftsmen, in drafting statutory instruments, were in almost constant contact with the committee and its officials so that very seldom did any regulation come before the committee where the draftsmen and the government for whom they work had not already taken cognizance of what the committee was likely to put up with and what it was likely to refuse to put up with; and of course, in Australia there is a provision by which anybody can move in the Senate for disallowance of any instrument to which the committee has taken objection.

In Great Britain, some years ago, the two counsel for the committee, accompanied by the then Law Clerk of the Senate and myself, observed the British committee in action and were, again, impressed by the fact that it was a much more effective body than ours, partly because of the powers that have been given it by the two houses and partly because of the attitude which the government and the government departments took towards it. And if honourable senators would like to see something very interesting in the way of a contrast between our committee and the British committee they will find two admirable articles in The Parliamentarian for October 1978: one, Parliamentary Scrutiny of Delegated Legislation (in the United Kingdom), by Sir Robert Speed, Mr. Speaker's counsel, and one by our own counsel to the committee here, Mr. Graham Eglington. And the contrast between the situation in the United Kingdom and the situation here is very striking indeed.

We arrived at the conclusion, after examining the procedure in Australia and in the United Kingdom—and I might add the procedure in the Ontario legislature's select committee—that it was desirable to bring in the report which is now before the Senate: first of all, that the committee should have the power to inquire into and report upon the appropriate principles to be observed in the drafting of powers enabling delegates of Parliament to make subordinate laws. One of our difficulties now is that we do not get these things until they are hard and fast—when they are frozen. It is much more difficult, of course, to get a department or an official to move if his own masterpiece has already been exposed to the eyes of the world than it would be if it were possible to get in contact with him beforehand to indicate certain of the things which were desirable and certain of the things which were not desirable. So we thought it desirable for the committee in future to inquire into the question of the principles to be observed in the drafting of powers for delegated legislation and, secondly, in the use of the delegated powers and subordinate laws.

I think I have observed before that there are certain officials who seem to have got it into their heads, Heaven knows how or why, that administrative convenience is a basic principle of our Constitution. Of course, it is not. In many instances it is the direct opposite of the principles of our Constitution. It is, at best, only a very subordinate, or should be only a very subordinate factor in the framing of subordinate legislation. We thought also that the committee should be empowered to examine the manner in which parliamentary control of delegated legislation should be effected, and, third, it should be empowered to look into the question of the role, functions and powers of the standing joint committee itself. If honourable senators will look back to the second report and see what we said there in great detail, and very trenchantly, I think, and compare that with the inadequate results that have followed, I think they will probably be convinced, as apparently members of another place were, that this report should be adopted as a guiding light, an inspiration, a guiding principle for the committee in the new Parliament.

Finally, the report recommends that members of the committee be empowered to travel outside Canada, namely, to Washington, D.C., for the purposes mentioned above and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee. That may strike honourable senators as a somewhat odd appendage to the rest of the report. But members of the committee were impressed by the fact that this whole question of regulation and regulations, how far they should go and how they should be applied, was now exciting great interest in more countries than one, and very notably in the United States. We had word that a number of members of the two houses in the United States had done a great deal of work on this and there was legislation being considered there which might have something to teach us. It was felt desirable that members of the committee should go down to hear and see at first-hand what is being done and then be able to decide on the basis of that first-hand experience whether what they were doing or trying to do down there would be appropriate up here.

I am careful to stress that last, because as honourable senators may have guessed from remarks of mine before, I am not one of those who feel everything American is perfect and that the solution to all our problems is to follow exactly what they are doing in the United States. On the other hand, I think sometimes we may learn something very useful from what they are doing, and it was the general opinion of the members of the committee that this is one case where we might learn something useful.

It is for those reasons, honourable senators, that I commend this report for the consideration of the house, and I hope that this house will act as the other house did and endorse the report so that it will be possible for the existing committee to make this trip to Washington, D.C., for the purposes I have indicated and so that the new committee in the new Parliament will have a path traced out for it which it may decide is useful to follow.

Senator McIlraith: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question?

Senator Forsey: Certainly.

Senator McIlraith: In the early part of your remarks I understood you to speak in terms of approbation of the action of Parliament in passing regulations and statutory instruments legislation and, as a second step, in setting up the committee.

Senator Forsey: Yes.

Senator McIlraith: Bearing in mind the nature of the work of the committee, and bearing in mind that at the same time as that was being done the answerability of ministers for the administration of their departments was being removed by the new procedure of removing the estimates of the government from examination by Committee of the Whole in the House of Commons, would you care to elaborate on the extent to which you think that the one and only effective opportunity for examining these matters in the House of Commons neutralized the work you approved of and applauded in the opening part of your remarks?

Senator Forsey: I confess, honourable senators, that that aspect of the subject had not occurred to me. Being in certain matters, like the Honourable Senator McIlraith, something of a traditionalist, I am inclined to agree with him about the change in the rules in the other place. I hope I shall not be accused of a breach of privilege by anyone over there when I say that. But I can't see that there is any direct connection between those changes and the difficulties that we have encountered in the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. It is a point I should have to think over before I can make any satisfactory reply.

I suppose those changes may have contributed to the, shall I say, feeling of security and self-confidence of ministers and, therefore, their officials, and it may have made them perhaps grow rather too big for their boots sometimes. But that is about as far as I should be prepared to go, because I do not know that examination of the estimates in the Committee of the Whole could really have done very much to help us, except perhaps for the inordinate use, as we think it, of votes in the Appropriation Act to set up all kinds of machinery and make all kinds of legislative changes.

We shall have before us in the committee on Thursday morning the regulations in connection with VIA Rail, which stem entirely from a vote in the Appropriation Act, and the committee will be taking a very hard look at these and also once again at this practice of putting important, substantive legislation into votes in the Appropriation Act. Possibly, if the old rules had prevailed in the other place, there would have been less of this sort of thing. Senator McIlraith, with his vast experience in the other place, will be far better qualified than I to comment on that, and so would various other people with experience in both houses, such as my friend, the Honourable Senator Walker, or a whole string of people on both sides, the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Bourget and Senator Langlois.

An Hon. Senator: Senator Flynn.

Senator Forsey: I said the Leader of the Opposition who is, I think, the same person as Senator Flynn, to the best of my belief, even though he appears for the moment to have crossed the floor, which is something I should never have expected to see him doing except after a change in government.

Senator Flynn: I am practising.

● (2040)

Senator Forsey: That is the best answer—a most inadequate and discursive one—that I can give to the Honourable Senator McIlraith.

Senator McIlraith: I thank the honourable senator for his answer. I wonder if I might be permitted to ask him a second question.

Has the committee, in the course of its work, made any estimate of the number of regulations and other statutory instruments that are offensive, and that would not have been produced if the ministers had had to answer for them in the other place, and if the legislators had examined them?

Senator Forsey: Well, again, I have had no experience of the other place, but I should have thought that one of the difficulties there was to get offensive regulations, or any kind of regulations, effectively before the house. It is hard enough when we put in our reports to get any appreciable amount of debate, and without the existence of our committee I think the opportunities for questioning these instruments would have been even smaller.

One of the marked contrasts between this country and the United Kingdom, in this respect, is that in the United Kingdom the committee gets officials actually before it, and very often, I think, even ministers. We have generally proposed to proceed more delicately, treading like Agag. We have written letters to the officials, and said, "What do you have to say about this?" Once in a while we have had them in before us. We have not done as much of that as they do in the United Kingdom. In the United Kingdom a great many regulations are passed under acts which require either affirmative or negative resolution. The resolution does not come into effect, on the one hand, until it has been affirmed by the House of Commons and the House of Lords within a certain period, or else, if it does come into effect, it may be negated by a vote of the houses within a certain period. There are very few statutes in Canada that provide for anything of the sort—very, very few indeed. I cannot remember the exact number, but I think it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of a dozen at the outside. Eleven is the figure that sticks in my mind. Perhaps Senator Godfrey could refresh my memory in that regard, but I think he will bear me out that it is a very small number.

Of course, we have no procedure here, such as they have in the Australian Senate, for having a senator rise and move that the offending regulation be disallowed. Even if we had the old procedure in the House of Commons in the matter of the Committee of the Whole on estimates, I still am afraid that there would not be a great deal of chance of getting effective parliamentary control. I think we need to have something in the way of either the Australian or the British system, and we need to build up the practice of calling ministers and their officials before the committee to testify in person.

That would be much more effective in some instances than writing them a letter and getting back as we did at first, though this has now pretty well ceased, replies which said, "This would require giving a legal opinion which, as you know, I am not allowed to give." That gramophone record, as I called it, we got in one instance, I remember, five times in one letter. We simply could not get these people to tell us why they thought this particular regulation, which in our judgment was of highly doubtful legal validity, was in their opinion legal. Well, in general we got over that, and we now usually wrinkle out of them, somehow, an explanation of why they think something is valid, why they think it is not an improper exercise of a power, why they think it does not offend against any of our criteria, and so on.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Forsey for answering my questions.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I think that some response is called for to this excellent report of this committee which, in the short time it has been operating in the public interest, has accomplished so much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: We in the Senate are very proud of the fact that the co-chairman, during the entire existence of this joint committee, has been Senator Forsey.

I myself am disappointed and appalled by what Senator Forsey has told us about the problems this committee has had in obtaining adequate response to the many comments it has made. The problem of regulations, of subordinate legislation, is one that has been with us for a long time. Not only this committee, but, as indicated by Senator Forsey, our own National Finance Committee has addressed itself to some of the very same problems. Some have been raised by individual senators, as in the comment of Senator McIlraith about what might have happened if the estimates had been discussed and passed by Parliament in the way they were discussed before certain changes took place.

What appals me is the fact that Senator Forsey has to tell us that the terms of reference and the powers of his committee appear to be inadequate. It seems to me to be a serious condemnation of our whole parliamentary process that a committee such as this, a joint committee of both houses, can find, in the words of Senator Forsey, important regulations—which, in effect, become the law of the land as far as those who are subject to them are concerned—that are of doubtful validity. I would agree with Senator Forsey that not only the postal regulations, but many more, are of doubtful validity.

There are two kinds of doubtful validity involved, and perhaps even more than two. One of them, however, arises from the very regulations themselves. Should they seek the wide powers that a statute appears to give them? The committee, I believe, has said that this is not its business. It has confined itself, rather, to the exercise of powers as stated in an act, and to whether the exercise of those powers goes beyond the authority given.

I have read the reports of this committee for some time now, and it seems to me that we are in a position where it is as clear as anything could be that over and over again the administrative bureaucracy is generally exceeding the powers that Parliament has given it. Yet, as Senator Forsey has told us, his committee—a joint committee of Parliament that was set up to police its legislative activities, (and I do not think that is too strong a word, since it was the intention of Parliament that they should be policed) is powerless to effect a change, or correct what is surely an injustice if there are Canadians, individually or collectively, whose interests are being prejudiced by the actions of bureaucrats. Surely there should be a remedy.

● (2050)

I believe there is a legal maxim that where there is no remedy there is no wrong, and that seems to be the problem here. I would say to Senator Forsey, and I am sure he will not mind my doing so even though he seemed to see some impatience in my reaction to his preliminary remarks, that I would be most interested in having him elaborate a little on the serious question he has raised, and that is as to what can be done in the future to give this committee the tools to do the job that it has been asked to do. Would he suggest a change in the terms of reference? Would he suggest a methodology, a mechanism by which this committee would be empowered to do more than beg departments, beg bureaucrats, beg ministers to write letters in response to their questions, their comments, and in many cases their clear statements that in their view officials had gone beyond the authority that Parliament intended to give them or that Parliament had in fact given? What can be done? Senator Forsey tells us that he may not be here when this committee again resumes its work. In my view, it would be a pity if the matter were left this way, as it stands, with merely a lament from Senator Forsey, when perhaps we could get from him some positive suggestions as to what might be done.

In other jurisdictions, certainly in the Congress of the United States, committees are empowered to get action. I would ask Senator Forsey if he really believes we are going to go on and on with a committee such as this, which finds over and over again an excess of authority and an abuse of power, when Parliament, as represented by this committee, is powerless to do anything about it. Is it the kind of situation where the Senate should say, "All right, we must tolerate it; there is nothing that can be done"? Senator Forsey mentioned one of the Australian devices, but it is more than a device; it is authority given to the second chamber in Australia to pass a resolution. I understood him to say that this was beyond the authority of this chamber. I wonder if it is. Perhaps we could have some comment from him on that point.

Would it not be possible for this chamber to resolve, on the authority of the joint committee, that such and such an abuse of power was condemned? Could we not pass a resolution and send it on to the other place saying, "This is an abuse of power which ought not to be permitted, and the Senate of Canada recommends that this abuse now stop." Perhaps we could have some comment from Senator Forsey on these points.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, if I may be allowed to reply to some of those very interesting questions asked by Senator Grosart—have I leave to do so? I do not want to transgress by making, as it were, a second speech.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Forsey: First of all, all the power we have now is the power to report, and when we have reported both houses can adopt our report which may contain, and our reports often have contained, condemnations of abuses of this power. But the trouble with that is that it has apparently, in some instances, absolutely no effect. We condemn and it is carried off down the wind; nothing happens.

The important point in Australia is that under the law a senator can move that an ordinance, an order in council, a regulation, a statutory instrument be disallowed, and when it is carried by the Senate, the regulation is wiped out. It automatically disappears. It is not merely a condemnation; it is not merely a resolution; it is not merely something that has to go to the other house. In Australia the matter is dealt with entirely by the upper house, incidentally, and if the upper house there disallows a regulation, it is gone; it is legally dead; it is null, void and of no effect. That is one power which some of us are inclined to think—I don't want to anticipate the conclusions to which the committee itself may come, but this is one power which some of us think we ought to have here, the power for our committee to make a recommendation upon which then any senator or any member of the House of Commons for that matter could get up and move that this regulation, this instrument be disallowed. And if that carried then that would be the end of the regulation.

I suppose there would be nothing to prevent the executive from having another go at it, but it would be a pretty temerarious cabinet which would venture after a disallowance of that sort had taken place to present the same concoction a second time to an enraged Senate and an enraged House of Commons. At least one hopes it would be pretty temerarious on the part of any government to do that.

A second thing that some of us feel would be very desirable would be to introduce into our legislation at every possible opportunity where there is an enabling clause provision either for an affirmative resolution or a negative resolution. If that can be done in Great Britain, it can be done here. It has been very successful in Great Britain. Just as the disallowance procedure in Australia has been very successful and it has been often used—very often; it is not simply a paper power which they could use; it is in fact a power which they actually use, often. In the United Kingdom the power of affirmative or negative resolution is used very effectively. That does not exist here except in an imperfect form in a very, very small number of statutes.

Another thing which we hope in virtue of this report the committee will in future be allowed to examine is whether when a bill comes forward containing enabling clauses, empowering the executive or some instrument of the executive, to make regulations or orders of any kind, those enabling clauses should stand referred to the Statutory Instruments Committee for specific examination by that committee and report. This would not, of course, infringe the jurisdiction of an ordinary committee considering the bill to consider all parts of it, but it would mean that the particular enabling clauses which are sometimes of an almost unbelievable amplitude would be examined by a committee which was accustomed to dealing with this kind of thing and which had a professional expertise, acquired by experience very largely. We think this would make a great difference.

Honourable senators may recall that when the immigration bill was before us there were three pages, I think, of enabling clauses. Some of them were of portent so extraordinary that my eyes almost started from my head as I read them.

Some honourable senators will perhaps recall also that the Leader of the Opposition moved an amendment to apply, I think it was an affirmative resolution procedure to regulations, under these particular clauses. That was an amendment I am happy to say I supported with enthusiasm and fervour, although honourable senators will also recall that it fell by the wayside. It did not get through.

But if we could have the committee specially charged with this duty able to examine enabling clauses in bills and to report to the houses, "This is a very dangerous, far too broad enabling clause," it might enable us to stop some of these abuses in their tracks, instead of having a look at the thing afterwards and saying, "My hat! This is awful. How in the world did Parliament ever let this get passed?" An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

These are some of the things that the committee will want to consider carefully, if this report is adopted by this house as it has already been adopted by the other house. I do not know if I have covered all of the ground Senator Grosart asked me to cover, but I think I have given him some indication of what members of the committee had in mind and some indication of the kind of action which the committee will be considering. I think there is a strong feeling in the committee that much more needs to be done; that this regulation-making power, this power of the bureaucracy has become a monster. One does not in the least impugn the good intentions of the people who exercise it, but we all know where good intentions pave the way to, in many instances. We do feel that it is, in essence, a very dangerous power that is often given, and with probably insufficient consideration, because it is not the business of the committee which is considering the substance of the bill, it is not primarily its business, to look at this particular aspect of it, whereas, if what some of us would like to see were adopted, it would be the primary duty of what one might call an expert committee to look at this and report back to the houses that this would simply not do.

Senator Goldenberg: Would Senator Forsey permit a question? Would he tell us where the Australian Senate derives its power, which he has described—that is the power of a senator to move that a regulation be disallowed? Is it under the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act? I doubt that.

Senator Forsey: I don't think so. I have not looked at that Constitution for some time or at all in this context. I suspect, however, that it is under actual legislation passed by the Commonwealth Parliament, but I am not sure. Certainly, it could not be done simply by standing orders and I cannot recall seeing anything in the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act providing for it. But I think it is done by means of valid legislation under that Constitution. I am pretty certain it is not in the Constitution. I have read it a good many times, though I must confess it was usually in connection with the last constitutional crisis in Australia, where this was not involved.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator Forsey:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 13th February, 1979.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask to have this stood. I do not think the Senate should be called upon to endure two speeches by me in one evening.

Inquiry stands.

INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY—INDUSTRIAL MISSION TO ITALY

Hon. Peter Bosa rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 15, 1979:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to developments arising out of the Agreement between Canada and the European Economic Community in the field of economic co-operation and, more specifically, to the recent industrial mission to Italy which was organized by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in which fifteen Canadian businessmen representing various segments of the economy participated.

He said: Honourable senators, I was pleased to accept an invitation by the Honourable Jack Horner, Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to be the leader of an industrial mission to Italy. That mission was sponsored by the officials of his department and it came about at the invitation of the Italian government and was perceived in Italy as a return mission corresponding to an Italian mission to Canada in the fall of 1976, which was headed by the Honourable Dr. Galli, the then Under Secretary to the Minister for Foreign Trade in Italy.

Our mission visited Italy for ten days starting January 21, 1979. It included 13 senior representatives of Canadian industry as well as three senior departmental officials.

I would ask that a list of the members of the mission to Italy be printed in Hansard at this point in my speech.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bosa: By way of background, industrial co-operation was first introduced when Prime Minister Trudeau visited a number of western European communities in Brussels in 1974 and 1975. Those visits set in motion a series of meetings between officials of Canada and their European counterparts to explore ways in which the promotion of industrial co-operation might be approached. The purpose was to encourage Canadian and European firms to consider exchanges in industrial technology, licensing agreements, joint ventures, joint research or development undertakings and two-way marketing arrangements. These, honourable senators, are the essential elements of industrial co-operation.

Before I deal with the details of the mission, I believe it is important that we have an understanding of the perception we have of Italy. Very often we form an opinion from the headlines of the media. In the case of Italy the news we get most often relates to violence, kidnappings, terrorism and perennial government crises. But there is another image of Italy: The official one given to us in an orientation session by our trade expert, Dr. Sidney Harris of the Canadian embassy in Rome, at his residence on the evening of January 21.

My impression of the orientation session is that there has been a remarkable performance of the Italian economy from an international perspective in terms of surplus on current accounts and rebuilding of reserves. In January of 1976 the situation seemed hopeless. They moved from a situation where the country had $25 billion in debts, and foreign exchange reserves of only $600 million, to a position in January, 1979, where reserves stand at $10 billion. In addition, they have $18 billion in gold at present prices and only $15 billion in external debts.

Most outstanding debts are of the long-term variety and pose no problem in the present financial health situation.

The principal economic concerns of the Italian government centre on the agricultural sector.

● (2110)

Italy is a net contributor to the Community budget, some 80 per cent of which goes toward agricultural subsidies principally to northern agriculture, benefiting Danish, Dutch and French farmers, while doing very little for Italian vegetable, citrus products, olive and wine producers. As a case in point, Italy spends $500 million per year importing expensive meat from other community producers when it could import the same quantity of meat for about half the price from other sources such as Australia and Argentina. At the same time, very little of the Community budget is allocated to social or regional development funds which could provide immense economic benefits to the Italian south known as il mezzogiorno. From this viewpoint, Italy looks forward to the eventual accession to the European Economic Community of Spain,

[Senator Bosa.]

Portugal and Greece, because they will add weight and focus the concerns of the Community on under-developed regions and the Mediterranean, and agricultural problems.

During last year Italy's inflation rate was brought down from 22 per cent to 12 or 13 per cent. At the end of 1978 unemployment stood at approximately 7.5 per cent.

Prior to the present crisis, Mr. Andreotti's government staked its future on a three-year economic plan, which was promised at the summit meeting of the leaders of the most industrialized nations of the world at Bonn, Germany, last summer. The plan, known as the Pandolfi plan, and named after the Minister of Finance, is stated to (a) reduce public expenditures by cutting back on the health services plan, preventing abuses of the pension system and tightening up tax collections; (b) reduce expenditures in the public sector industries, a situation unique to Italy where public industries account for 35 per cent of the GNP; (c) continue to reduce the rate of inflation by holding the line on wage, salary and price increases; and (d) tackle economic development of the south. The hopeful result of this three-year package is a growth rate of 4 to 4.5 per cent of the GNP.

Pandolfi's plan was tabled in Parliament last January. As honourable senators know, Mr. Andreotti has since submitted his resignation and attempts are being made at this time to form a new coalition.

The situation ought not to be viewed with alarm, as coalition governments have become a way of life in Italy. It may seem from the outside that Italy is politically on the edge of the precipice, but the country has shown over the last 30 years that it has remarkable recuperative powers. It has a lot of know-how and ingenuity, but is practically devoid of natural resources.

To get back to the mission, the program in Canada was co-ordinated by the director of the Consultative Services Branch, Mr. John Dawson; his assistant Mr. H. Larose; and Mr. D. McJanet of our European commercial bureau. In Italy, arrangements were finalized between the officers of the commercial division of the Canadian embassy in Rome and Milan, namely, Dr. S. Harris and Messrs. Sulzenko, Staples and Summers, and the officers of the Institute for Foreign Trade, Istituto Commercio Estero, led by Dr. Michele Armento, who has extensive experience in this area, having served as Italian Trade Commissioner in Toronto for five years until 1976.

After a brief visit with the Under Secretary for Foreign Trade, Onorevole Bernardi, we were formally received by the President of Istituto Commercio Estero, Mr. Deserti, a self-made man who was recently recruited from private industry by the Italian government to head this very important agency. In perfect English he extended his welcome to the mission. I then followed with a few remarks on the historical ties between Canada and Italy, after which the Canadian Ambassador to Italy, His Excellency d'Iberville Fortier, spoke at greater length on culture and trade. The members of the Canadian mission met their Italian counterparts on this occasion. I ask support of other minority parties in Parliament. The communists, it is believed, are not interested in showing that their popularity is on the decline, so the complex process of negotiation and consensus is likely to continue for some time. An Italian parliamentarian told me that what is wrong with the Italian electoral system is the "proportionate representations." They are locked in a system which, in theory, is ideal but, in practice governments are condemned to a perennial minority position.

Since Mr. Andreotti's visit to Canada in the fall of 1977 and the Canadian involvement in the assistance to the earthquake area of Friuli, relations between Canada and Italy have never been better. Industrial co-operation provides a new dimension to this relationship. It expands the present ties, of which there are many, between the two countries. There are historical, ethnic, cultural, economic and political ties, and I should like to mention some that go back to the very beginning of the development of this country starting with its discovery by Giovanni Caboto in 1497. Giovanni da Verrazzano, in 1526, convinced the French Court that settlement in Canada was both desirable and feasible. Enrico Tonti, the explorer, was assistant to de La Salle in 1678. Brigadier General Francesco Carlo Burlamacchi was Montcalm's third-in-command in the battle on the Plains of Abraham. There are many examples in Canadian history such as the ones I have cited.

• (2120)

In addition, there are one million Canadians of Italian origin in Canada at the present time. Canada and Italy are both members of NATO and both belong to the group of seven most industrialized democracies of the west, and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. In Rome, there is a Canadian academic centre, and much activity is going on there. Recently, "Il Gruppo Dei Giovani" from Toronto presented Pirandello, both in English and in Italian, at the Pirandello festival in Agrigento.

Trade between Canada and Italy has been valued at approximately $1 billion a year. Approximately 25 per cent of the national wealth of both countries depends on exports. There are already substantial investments and joint ventures in both countries. I visited the Alcan Aluminum plant located in Ornago near Milan, and the presence of Olivetti and Pirelli in Canada is well known.

The James Bay hydro-electric development was completed by a joint venture between Impregilo of Italy and Spirro of Montreal, Quebec. Bombardier of Canada and Grandi Motori of Trieste have joined forces for the manufacturing of turbines, diesel motors and so forth. Cantieri Navali Riuniti of Genoa have joined their expertise with Davie Shipbuilding of Lauzon, Quebec, in their bid for the building of six patrol frigates for the Canadian navy, valued at approximately $1.5 billion.

Negotiations are proceeding between Atomic Energy of Canada and NIRA and ENEL of Italy for the purchase of two Canadian reactors to be built in Sicily and Sardinia. An agreement for the exchange of nuclear technology may be concluded in a few months, which will pave the way for joint manufacture of CANDUS in Italy for domestic and export markets.

The results of the mission will become apparent in time. The mission itself served to introduce Canadian firms, and Canadian interests generally, to the Italian government and business community. Precise industrial co-operation projects, by and large, remain to be worked out through active follow-up by Canadian and Italian firms, which met each other, as I stated, in the course of the mission, and by the governments of both countries. The Italian construction firms and consulting services are, in very large measure, externally oriented, with 80 per cent to 90 per cent of their volume of business being conducted abroad. Considerable interest has been expressed by Italian firms concerning the extent to which concessional financing from Canada may be available for third country projects in which both Canadian and Italian firms may co-operate. It would appear that there are two principal areas for co-operation between Canadian and Italian consultants. One is in the area of technology transfer where complementariness has been identified, and the other is in the area of combining skills and financial strengths in joint ventures in third countries.

Several opportunities for co-operation in the manufacturing areas are being assessed, especially in plastics and in medical equipment. The area of machine tools manufacture also appears to be one of promise.

Two mission members who are in the business of supplying specialized machine tools and other equipment to the nuclear industry are currently examining the results of several meetings with the Italian government and industry representatives in Rome, Genoa and Milan. These members were much impressed with the state of development of the Italian nuclear-related industry and, like other mission members, are assessing opportunities for co-operation with Italian firms.

In general, mission members were, at the conclusion of the mission, unanimously enthusiastic about the response of Italian industry and government to this Canadian initiative. The excellent recovery by the Italian economy in adjusting to the aftermath of the 1973 energy crisis, and the sophistication, especially in an international context, of Italian manufacturers, contractors and consultants, also encouraged our people toward the premise that Canada/Italy industrial co-operation across a wide industrial spectrum is indeed a worthwhile and attainable objective.

Honourable senators, I was pleased to have been part of this mission and to have been given the opportunity to make a small contribution to its success.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PARLIAMENT

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)—PRICE INCREASE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I will put my question to his deputy who will no doubt take it as notice.

I understand that a decision has been taken by some department to increase the subscription cost to the Official Report of the Senate from $3.00 to $32.00 and if I am not mistaken that of the House of Commons from $3.00 to $65.00. I do not know whether it is true, but I wonder if it is due to the fact that the government feels that the Senate is given too much publicity or that it does not want too much publicity about what is going on in the other place?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, my good friend, the Leader of the Opposition is still making gratuitous assumptions. I had the opportunity to investigate the matter yesterday as a result of a letter which I had received and I learned from the Government Publishing Centre that no decision has been taken to that effect and that those inquiries concerning the alleged increase in the price of Hansard were made as a result of an apparently unfounded article published in the Ottawa Citizen last week. However, following the question of my friend, I am ready to make further inquiries and if I learn something new, I will be pleased to advise this house.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY BILL

PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I should like to answer several questions put to the Leader of the Government. The first set of questions had to do with the Energy Supplies Emergency Bill, Bill C-42.

On February 22 several questions were put to the Leader of the Government. The first question came from the Leader of the Opposition, who asked whether there had been consultation with provincial governments prior to the introduction of the bill. This was followed by a question from Senator Olson, who asked if there were going to be consultations so that Alberta would understand the totality of what this bill intends to do.

Senator Perrault did not undertake at that time to give a specific response to these questions, but I am in a position now to make the following comments.

The Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979, is essentially the same as the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1974, which received parliamentary approval in January 1974 and had a legislated duration of two and a half years, expiring on June 30, 1976.

The 1974 act was apparently acceptable to the provincial governments at that time. Alberta's co-operation was reflected in the fact that it nominated one of the four members of the original Energy Supplies Allocation Board. As well, there was full consultation with the other provinces on the allocation and rationing programs that were developed pursuant to the original act but never, of course, implemented.

Provincial energy ministers were informed by telex on February 19 that Bill C-42 had been introduced and copies were sent to them that day by courier. Provincial governments have been invited, at the deputy minister level, to a federal-provincial conference meeting to be held in early March to discuss Bill C-42, among other things.

ENERGY

POWER OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO ACT UNILATERALLY— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Langlois: On the same day, February 22, Senator Smith (Colchester) asked "whether the federal government believes that everything that must be done to carry out the provisions of the bill concerning the rationing of energy can be done without the consent of the provinces."

In reply I can state that Bill C-42, the Energy Supplies Emergency Bill, 1979, is based on the peace, order and good government provision of the British North America Act. It does not, therefore, require the consent of the provinces. However, the federal government will continue to solicit the views and assistance of the provincial governments in the development and possible implementation of allocation or rationing programs pursuant to Bill C-42.

Honourable senators will note that in clauses 14 and 15 of Bill C-42, provision is made for the Energy Supplies Allocation Board to enter into agreements with the provinces. In explaining the previous bill to the standing committee in December, 1973, the Honourable Donald S. Macdonald, the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, indicated that he had discussed these provisions relating to gas and electricity with the provinces, who advised him that they were satisfied with this format.

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, on the same day, Senator Roblin asked if the leader could give the Senate the reviews of the International Energy Agency insofar as they affect this country.

In answer to that, the publication of the OECD entitled, "International Energy Agency, Energy Policies and Programmes of IEA Countries, 1977 Review (Paris 1978)" contains at pages 67-75 the country report on Canadian energy policies and programs, and at pages 222-227 an annex relating to Canadian energy research and development programs. The relevant sections are attached to the report, and I would be pleased to send copies to my honourable colleague if he wishes to read them.

STRATEGIC OIL RESERVES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, on February 20, 1979, Senator Roblin asked a question regarding strategic oil reserves in Canada.

Canada does not have a strategic petroleum reserve for civilian use, in the sense that the United States and some other countries do. Commercial stocks, which are distributed across the country in relation to the requirements of the oil products market, are equivalent to about 75 days' supply measured against our total consumption of some 1,800,000 barrels a day.

• (1410)

However, measured on the IEA basis—that is, in relation to our net imports of just over 200,000 barrels a day—these stocks are equivalent to more than 600 days' supply. Stocks in import-dependent parts of the country—notably, eastern Canada—are higher for operational reasons than in those parts of the country which are supplied by pipeline with domestic petroleum.

I repeat, I have photocopies of the OECD report in question and I would be delighted to send it to my honourable colleague if he is interested in seeing it.

LOTO CANADA

MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON REPORT RELATING TO LOTO SELECT PROJECT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, on February 22 Senator Roblin asked whether the Auditor General is in the process of investigating the Loto Select Project.

I am informed that the Auditor General is Loto Canada's auditor and, as such, will cover Loto Select as part of his normal review of Loto Canada's activities. It is not anticipated that there will be any special investigation.

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES—PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Langlois: Following Senator Roblin's question relating to the Loto Select Project, Senator Guay asked whether or not the Premier of Manitoba had indicated acceptance or rejection for joint participation in the plan to upgrade the Winnipeg Arena.

As of the date of the question, the Government of Manitoba had not indicated to the federal government whether or not it was prepared to participate in the plan to upgrade the Winnipeg Arena.

Still on the same date, Senator Roblin then asked whether any contact had been made with the Board of Governors of the National Hockey League to determine their views.

I am informed that the National Hockey League meets in mid-March. It is not known whether the subject of expansion will be on its agenda at that time. If not, it will likely be discussed, I am informed, by the NHL some time in June.

Honourable senators, I have answers to other questions with me today, but I shall defer giving the answers until such time as the senators who asked the questions are in their seats.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY BILL

PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—QUESTION

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question of the acting leader arising out of his answer to Senator Flynn's question respecting Bill C-42.

In his answer the acting leader said there would be a meeting of the provincial deputy ministers of energy and the federal government some time early in March. Is it the intention to withhold final passage of Bill C-42 until some time after that meeting so that we can hear the attitude of some of the provinces, particularly the supplier-provinces of petroleum, before the bill passes all stages?

Senator Langlois: Though there exists a strong possibility that this bill could be held up for some time either in the other place or in the Senate for other reasons, I cannot give such assurance to my honourable friend. I will make further inquiries and provide honourable senators with any additional information there might be in this respect.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask one or two supplementary questions in connection with the oil situation. First of all, I thank my honourable friend for his illuminating answer, and I would be glad to have the material he mentioned. I rise at this point to ask whether the material from the OECD gives the regulations of the International Energy Agency which Canada has agreed to subscribe to.

Senator Langlois: I have not had time to read all the material. I shall check into that and provide my honourable friend with that information.

Senator Roblin: I also note that my honourable friend, in respect to strategic reserves, said that special reserves were being maintained in the Atlantic provinces due to their peculiar supply situation. Is it possible for my honourable friend to give the house the details of that reserve?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I do not have the information at hand as to the basis of the reserve that is maintained in the Atlantic provinces due to the fact that they are not linked by pipeline to a domestic petroleum source. I shall make further inquiries about that and inform the house.

LOTO CANADA

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES—PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary in connection with the answer the acting leader gave respecting consultation with the National Hockey League in relation to the plan to upgrade the Winnipeg Arena.

Am I correct in assuming from my honourable friend's answer that the offer the federal government made in respect of that matter was made without consultation with the National Hockey League?

Senator Langlois: I do not have that information at hand. I shall make further inquiries and inform the house at a later date.

[Senator Olson.]

BEEF IMPORT BILL

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Sparrow, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald, for the second reading of the Bill S-13, intituled: "An Act to control the importation of beef into Canada".—(Honourable Senator McDonald).

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, Senator McDonald has kindly consented to yield to me at this time so that I might make a few remarks about Bill S-13.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

• (1420)

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I have been in the cattle business for 50 years, and most of the time I was broke.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Hays: Until recently.

Senator Flynn: When did you stop?

Senator Hays: The cattle business is run on a boom-or-bust basis, and the reason I was broke is that most of the time there are more busts than booms. And I think that is what Bill C-13 is all about.

Honourable senators, each year it takes one cow to provide four Canadians with their meat, milk, butter and cheese requirements, and it takes one chicken to provide one Canadian with his egg requirements. Each Canadian eats 219 eggs a year and consumes 100 pounds of beef. That is some of the simple arithmetic used in the livestock business.

Canada is the second largest land area in the world, as you well know. The only country that is larger is the Soviet Union. But we can only use 6 per cent of the total area of Canada. We have 170 million acres between fences, and that gives us an average of seven acres per person. We could probably support a much larger population, but I think that to get the beef business into perspective, you have to have that sort of a background to see more clearly the situation you are dealing with.

Honourable senators, since 1974 we have had thousands of beef producers who have gone broke in this country because they were producing beef at below the cost of production. Beef animals are poor converters. We have been going backwards in the last 60 years in the breeding of beef cattle. With the animal we have today it takes nine pounds of feed to make one pound of live meat. At the same time it takes three and a half pounds of feed to make one pound of pork, and two and a half pounds of feed to make one pound of chicken. That is the sort of competition that beef producers are facing today.

We do not compete in the production of cattle with countries such as the United States. We have only 100 frost-free days in Canada, by and large, although some areas have as many as 150 and other areas as few as 70. So most of the time our 170 millions acres are under snow cover. We have frost every day in one area or another, so when you take the land out of production for that much longer than would be the case, say, in the State of Texas, or in New Zealand where they have 10 months' pasture, you can see how we have to work our land to produce the commodities we need in Canada. We could easily import all our beef. They produce it cheaper in Africa, Latin America, the United States, Australia and New Zealand. But it would cost $4.5 billion to import our beef requirements.

We have long since learned that there are certain things every country must have in order to be self-sufficient and enjoy some of the luxuries of life. In Japan, for example, a roast of beef costs anywhere from $16 to $28 a pound, but they see fit to protect their beef industry because of their particular circumstances. They have 100 million people in a small area. They can't produce the grain it takes to feed the animals, and they don't have the pasture to graze them. They are on an import basis and consequently their consumption is low—about four pounds per capita as opposed to our 100 pounds.

As I have said, most people feel that there are at least a few kinds of food that every country should produce for itself, such as meat, potatoes, milk and other essentials. In Sweden, Finland and Norway—and I have been to those countries—they produce their own meat and potatoes and milk, and so on, and they protect those commodities. But in Canada we have not protected the beef business. Nor have we protected the lamb business. So long as it is healthy, lamb can be shipped to Canada from any country in the world. Consequently, we do not have a lamb business in Canada. We import all of our lamb from Australia and New Zealand, because it is healthy lamb and meets our standards. Our consumption of lamb is about half a pound per capita.

In terms of whether we need this bill, I suppose the question to ask ourselves is whether we want a beef industry or not. If we do not want one, we can go ahead and spend $4.5 billion and import it. But I suggest that it would play havoc with our balance of payment situation, if we were to spend another $4.5 billion to $5 billion. If we say we need the beef industry here, then it seems to me that one day Canada will have to become self-sufficient in that industry, as it is in other industries.

We do not import eggs, for example; not unless we are short of eggs. We supply all the eggs for our own consumption. We have consistency in price with a fair profit for the producer and we have an adequate supply. We are self-sufficient in the poultry business, the broiler business. Having decided we should be self-sufficient in the chicken business, we now consume about 35 pounds of chicken per year per capita. Our chicken is as good as that produced in any country, and our eggs are better than those of most countries. In our milk industry we are self-sufficient, and our milk is as good as that produced anywhere.

The beef we produce is also a good product. Our government inspection system is top-notch and we have a high-quality product. It is not the best quality in the world. It is not as good as Japan's. Scottish beef is probably better than ours, and American beef is a bit superior. That is because we do not want our beef quite so fat.

Having said all that, let me discuss what this bill gives us. It gives us a beef import law. I think all countries except Canada now have beef import laws. The United States does, New Zealand, Australia and all of the Economic Community countries have beef laws. We are not unique in bringing in such a law, therefore. We pretty well have reciprocity with the United States in respect of live cattle, and with our quota system for dressed beef this year we are bringing in only 155 million pounds. Live beef can be brought in from the United States. There is a price factor, and it is triggered by the discounted dollar and the 1.5 per cent duty, as Senator Roblin pointed out last night. It then moves into this country, and that is what disturbs us. Our costs are much higher, in my opinion, than those in the United States. All cattle people do not share this view. However, I think they are higher, because they have seven or eight months of pasture and we have only three to four months of pasture. Our costs are higher because of our tariff set up—the protection of other commodities, such as clothes, machinery and that sort of thing.

We in the beef business could buy our clothes cheaper from Korea, but we are protecting the textile industry. We could buy our automobiles cheaper from Japan, but we feel we should protect our automobile industry. We protect all of those industries and they, in turn, are our customers.

If we do not have regulation, the cattle can just rush in here. If the dollar were to go to $1.04, we would drop about 20 cents per pound for our cattle, and 20 cents per pound means about $200 or $250 per head. From 1974 until the spring of 1977, I believe that on every 1,000-pound animal that went to market the producer—the person who fed and produced it—lost $100. I believe the producers lost somewhere between $650 million and $700 million, and we are now paying for it.

I have just returned from Australia and New Zealand. At the peak in 1974 Australia had 31 million cattle. They went through the same devastating period. New Zealand had about 11 million cattle. The statistics I have are kind of hairy, because no one really knows how many cattle there are in the various countries. In Australia they told me they are now down to about 21 million cattle, and in New Zealand they are down to about six million cattle. In Australia over 12,000 people went broke. So now there is a world shortage of beef.

These are cycles which have been in existence since 1900. But why does Canada have to go through this? Would it not have been better if we had got 60 cents per pound for cattle throughout this time at 110 pounds per capita of consumption, rather than our now having to decrease consumption to perhaps 95 pounds, and so on?

This really is not good business. We have 101 marketing boards in this country which control the production of goods and services, and that sort of thing, and in my opinion, this law will give Canadian producers an opportunity to say, "Well, I can produce 100 pounds of beef per capita in Canada. If I can do that and expect a reasonable return, it will be good business for me to do it." If we cannot do it on this basis, if we decide not to stop the beef from coming in today, we will further short the market and we shall see the price of beef go completely out of sight. It may go to as much as $5 or $6 per pound, and the producer would then just get out of the business. We have been hurt too many times, it seems to me, for us not to have some control on imports of canned meat, live beef, and all the other types of meat.

Honourable senators, this is a good bill and I believe we should take a close look at it. It provides for quotas, and it supplements the power to control the movement of live cattle.

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question? At the beginning of his remarks he mentioned the number of cows and chickens that are required to feed Canadians. Would he be kind enough to elaborate?

Senator Hays: I said it took one cow to feed four Canadians and one chicken to provide for one Canadian's egg requirements. We have roughly six million dairy cows and beef cows and a little over 22 million chickens to feed 24 million people. A chicken lays 19 dozen eggs a year, and that is about what a Canadian consumes.

● (1430)

Senator Molgat: Would Senator Hays permit another question? During his comments he made a remark about American beef being superior to Canadian beef. I presume that he really meant to say that superiority depends on taste. It is a question of whether a person wants fat beef or non-fat beef, or beef fed on corn or beef fed on grain. Was the honourable senator really stating that American beef is superior beef?

Senator Hays: Well, we all have great egos. Everything in Canada is great, but I get around so much that after a while I think I am being carried away a little.

American beef is better than ours, and the reason it is better is that they have a different grading system. After we are through feeding an A-1 animal—that is the highest grade we have—it will have less than half an inch of fat all over the carcass, and the same applies with regard to kidney fat. There does not have to be any fat in the red meat. At the point where we say we are through feeding the animal, the Americans would feed it for another 30 to 40 days. They would put another half inch of fat on it including another half inch of fat in the muscle. All the taste of the meat is in the fat.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 20, the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, the sponsor of this bill, an act to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, gave a very lucid explanation of the effect of its one clause. Very properly, he reviewed the original act in order to show just what this amendment means, and since he gave a detailed explanation of the act and the bill, it is not necessary for me to mention their provisions at any length.

As Senator Frith stated, the original act, passed in 1966, provided the sum of $500 million, which was to be expended over a period of 15 years, to assist the provinces in paying for certain health training facilities. The assistance to be given would be up to 50 per cent of the cost of planning or designing any health training facility, and contributions towards the cost of acquiring, constructing or renovating any building to be used as a health training facility. The program was to be in effect from January 1, 1966, to December 31, 1980. Bill C-2 changes the termination date so far as the federal government is concerned from December 31, 1980, to November 4, 1978, about two years and two months earlier than the date set out in the act, which would result in a saving of somewhere between $70 million and $74 million.

Honourable senators, I well realize that on the second reading of a bill one should discuss its principle, only referring to such clauses as are necessary to show how that principle is being applied, and make an orderly and reasonable presentation. On examining Bill C-2, however, it is difficult to determine just what principle is involved. It may be a matter of a modification of the policy which regulates the relationship between the federal government and the provinces, or the federal government may be proclaiming a new policy—that is, a policy of being able to break an arrangement with the provinces if it so wishes and without the consent of these provinces.

Senator Flynn: That is not new.

Senator Macdonald: I know that this has not been stated as a principle underlying Bill C-2, yet, in my opinion, the bill has that effect. I do not think it can be denied that the Health Resources Fund Act created, or implied the creation of, a joint federal-provincial program. Indeed, it was so understood by the senator who sponsored the legislation in this chamber on June 29, 1966. I quote Senator Lang who said this:

Briefly, by way of background, I think this bill might be looked at as a joint effort between the federal government and the provinces and in an area which requires immediate attention.

Yet, honourable senators, by Bill C-2 we have the federal government terminating the program without any consultation with, without any reference to, the provinces, and without so much as having the courtesy to give them prior notice. They were simply notified that the program was terminated two years before the date set out in the act. In my opinion, it was a very high-handed action, and an action which was bound to have an adverse effect on federal-provincial co-operation.

It should be remembered that while the federal authority is now terminating an arrangement in this unilateral manner, there was plenty of consultation before the Health Resources Fund Act was passed in 1966. I quote Senator Lang again when he spoke on second reading on June 29, 1966:

Honourable senators will remember that last July the Prime Minister made a public announcement to the effect that it was the intention of the government to set up a health resources fund. Subsequent thereto an ad hoc committee was established of federal and provincial officials to look into the needs and the extent of those needs in this area, and it made certain recommendations. These recommendations were considered at a federal-provincial meeting of health ministers held last September, and out of those deliberations has come the legislation we have before us tonight.

There was plenty of consultation before the program was undertaken, but none when the federal authority wanted to terminate it. Why the federal government did not consult the provinces before taking this action I do not know. The minister, in her speech on second reading in the House of Commons, said, "The provinces were not informed for obvious reasons." I have not seen anywhere what those so-called "obvious reasons" are. In my opinion, the action of the federal government in terminating this joint effort in this manner is a severe blow to the mutual trust which should exist between these two levels of government.

Honourable senators, there is another principle which perhaps is contained in Bill C-2, and that is the restraint policy of the government. A reason given for this peculiar action is a financial one—to cut down on health service facilities to save money. The minister made a very definite statement about this when she said at a meeting of the Health and Welfare Committee on December 12, 1978:

—the real reasons are the economic policy and the decision of the government in early August to reduce our global expenditures.

I expect that brings into, or could bring into, the discussion the whole so-called restraint program of the government. That I do not propose to discuss, but I do want to say that I am amazed at the government's terminating a program relating to health services and at the same time increasing expenditures in other less important fields. In my opinion, there appears to be a lack of priorities, or a lack of communication, among various departments of government. I do not know if instructions went out to certain departments and not to others to cut expenditures. Yet, we see health services being cut by something over $70 million and, at the same time, we see another minister prepared to spend $18.5 million to assist in the building of rinks in the cities of Edmonton, Winnipeg, Hamilton and Quebec. More than that we see that same minister prepared to pay one-third of the cost of a new stadium in Vancouver, and this one-third will come to over $28 million.

● (1440)

So here we have an amazing spectacle of one minister, in the name of restraint, reducing the health budget by over $70 million, and another minister giving away at least $47 million for new or improved stadiums to promote sport, both amateur and professional. In my opinion, honourable senators, this shows a deplorable lack of communication between departments of government; it shows a lack of discretion and a deplorably distorted sense of value.

I realize, of course, it can and will be said that the cost of health services is paid for by taxes, and the cost of sport is financed by the profits from the government operated lottery. I do not accept this argument; I do not accept this poor excuse. It is all government money, no matter if it is raised by taxation, by lottery, by an increase in the money supply or any other means. It is all government money, and the government can direct where it will go.

Honourable senators, it may very well be claimed that no principle is involved in Bill C-2. Indeed, the sponsor did not mention any. He dwelt at length on what was accomplished by the provinces under the provisions of the act. And, indeed, the list of what has been accomplished is impressive. To me this is a powerful argument against the bill. If so much good has been accomplished, then in all probability more could be done by using the balance of that sum of $500 million for the purposes for which it was intended.

I realize, of course, that the argument has been made, the excuse has been given, that the program is practically completed in any event, that there are now plenty, indeed, an over-supply, of health training facilities. Personally I am not convinced of this. I would like to know, for example, if all applications to medical schools in the last few years have been accepted. I would like to know if some have been turned away, and have had to go to universities outside of Canada to obtain their medical training. It would be interesting to know if there are any Canadian young people now studying medicine in universities outside of Canada, and if there are any who were refused admission to Canadian universities on the grounds that the facilities were filled. In my own small area I know of two who could not be accepted by medical schools in Canada and who are now studying at the University of Dublin—two bright people.

With respect to this argument that the program has been pretty well completed in any event, I notice that in some provinces the allotment—if that is the proper term to use—has not been wholly used. It was not wholly used in Nova Scotia, Quebec, Manitoba, British Columbia or in the Northwest Territories. I do not know if 85 per cent of its allotment was all that Nova Scotia was prepared to use, or if this was all that the province could afford to use. And, I do not know if the federal government has this information either, because they never asked for it.

It would seem to me that those provinces which have not used the whole of the amounts allotted to them are being discriminated against. It may very well be they were planning for the future, having in mind that the fund would exist for two more years, in which time their plans would be complete. I believe the high-handed, abrupt and unilateral decision of the federal government shows not only discrimination, but a lack of understanding between the federal government and the provinces which is deplorable.

I know that the honourable sponsor of this bill, Senator Frith, went to some pains to show this reduction applied only to health training facilities, not to health measures in general. I can understand his desire to keep the discussion of this bill to that narrow field, yet I cannot believe the ordinary citizen is going to make that fine distinction. I do not believe, for example, that a person crippled by arthritis will appreciate that distinction; nor do I believe that persons whose activities are severely limited by heart or lung difficulties will understand why money is to be saved, and why it is not spent on medical research if it is there to be saved.

No, honourable senators, I do not believe the ordinary Canadian will understand or appreciate why the government is going to follow a restraint policy in health matters and at the same time offer money—lots of money, millions of dollars—to build stadiums in wealthy cities. To my mind it shows a distorted sense of values which is beyond understanding.

Perhaps some person will be bold enough to claim there is no need for further assistance in medical research, that there is no need to transfer any moneys not used under the provisions of the Health Resources Fund Act to other health measures, including medical research. If there are people with such ideas, I hope they will read a statement by Dr. J. Donald Hatcher, the Dean of the Faculty of Medicine at Dalhousie University in Halifax. According to a report carried by the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on February 17 last, Dr. Hatcher said in part:

The federal government's policy towards scientific and medical research is one of restraint, curtailment and neglect... I am disturbed and as a Canadian I am embarrassed that medical research is viewed by my federal government in this way.

That is what he said at a dinner in Nova Scotia of the Canadian Cancer Society.

The report also states that Dr. Hatcher was critical of the plans to cut $10 million from the Health Resources Fund; which is the source of federal support for new research and teaching space in hospitals and medical schools. Judging from Dr. Hatcher's remarks, it does not sound as if he is convinced the need of health training facilities has been met.

Honourable senators, I believe the arrangement made with the provincial governments under the Health Resources Fund Act should not terminate, and I deplore the manner in which it is being terminated. I am certainly strongly of the opinion that if it could be shown the need no longer exists, then any unspent or unneeded portion of the $500 million appropriation should be used for other health purposes. Since I wholly disagree with curtailing money for health purposes, and at the same time providing millions of dollars to assist in building stadiums to promote sport of one kind or another, I am unable to support the second reading of Bill C-2.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Macdonald on an excellent speech on this controversial bill. I believe he quite properly put his finger on the issue at the second reading stage, and that is the principle. He is quite right, there is a principle in this bill, and he has developed and given his opinion on that principle and its corollaries.

The principle behind the bill is that it is a part of the restraint program. The government undertook to cut expenditures, and it had to pick the places where it would cut expenditures.

There is no absolute black and white to this particular bill in terms of its being a perfect solution. I suppose the Health Resources Fund was picked as an object of spending restraint because, as Senator Macdonald pointed out, it is a program that was undertaken with the provinces, with consultation in advance, and is a program that is 85.5 per cent complete. It is a program that requires initiatives from the provinces. The provinces have to take the initiative to undertake to build the facilities, and then apply for help from the federal government, I do not believe there is a principle involved in this bill—

Senator Flynn: There is never a principle involved in government actions.

• (1450)

Senator Frith: —that raises the question of a new policy, to use the words of Senator Macdonald. The federal government has not launched a program of cutting back or changing agreements it has made with the provinces as a matter of policy. The fact is that the restraint program had to include a large number of programs that involved relationships with the provinces and joint undertakings by the provinces because, as we all know, a very large proportion of the federal budget is in fact spent on transfer payments and joint programs with the provinces.

Once the decision was made—and that is the principle I understand my learned colleague and I disagree on—that there was to be restraint, and that there was to be a reduction in spending, it was an absolutely inevitable and relentless corollary that there had to be some cuts in programs that were undertaken with the provinces.

This one was selected because it was 85.5 per cent completed, and because it was possible to give some lead time in respect of applications. After the provinces had been notified of the government's intention to include the fund in its restraint program they were told that allocations would continue for applications made up to the cut-off date, so that there was time to get more applications in. That, in fact, has happened.

It is perfectly understandable that there is a disagreement. If there is a disagreement in principle on the restraint program itself, then, of course, there is a difference of opinion here, and there is bound to be in respect of any program of this kind. If we decide in our home to reduce budgets and to cut down on our spending, someone will find it hurts. The basic principle of this bill is that this is one area in which there is not a great deal of hurt because of the fact that the program is 85.5 per cent completed. It is not a perfect cut, but a cut within that framework and within that context.

I have no further comments to make. It is clear that we will want to discuss many of these questions in committee. The questions of Senator Macdonald specifically could be properly addressed in committee. I suggest, therefore, that the motion for second reading be agreed to, after which I will move that the bill be referred to the Health, Welfare and Science Committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

Motion agreed to.

TRADEMARK BILL, 1979

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 13, the debate on the motion of Senator Godfrey for the second reading of Bill S-11, relating to trademarks and unfair competition.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to discuss either the principle or the policy of Bill S-11 at this particular time for reasons that will become obvious, I hope, in a moment or two.

As Senator Godfrey made clear in his excellent introduction of the measure on February 13, this is a very complicated bill. It deals with a subject that has concerned the Government of Canada from the very beginning—the protection of trademarks. The bill before us is, in effect, an updating and, to some extent, an amendment of the existing Trade Marks Act of 1954.

The government, being concerned about certain inadequacies and inconsistencies in the act, referred the matter to the Economic Council of Canada, which took a number of years to investigate the whole question of the protection of intellectual property which, of course, would include copyrights as well as trademarks and industrial designs. The Economic Council reported in 1971, and the government responded with a white paper in 1974.

We now have this bill before us, and it, presumably, takes into account all the reactions over the years to the report of the Economic Council and the white paper. Yet we have been told by Senator Godfrey that there is another examination of the bill going on outside of Parliament. The government has sent a team to conduct seminars across the country, starting in Edmonton on February 20 and concluding in Halifax on March 8. This indicates to me that the government is still not sure it has a good bill. I would agree with the government to that extent. I am not yet sure that this is a good bill. I am quite sure that those who are conducting these seminars will discover, from the reactions of those who attend them, that once again the government seems completely unable to face a situation and come up with an answer that will in any way meet the problems created by that situation.

It seems absurd to me, after this long discussion about the Economic Council report and the white paper, that the government should introduce a bill and then say, "But wait. We may have to amend. We don't know. We still have to take this to the public. We are going to have seminars across the country."

I am not blaming Senator Godfrey for this. I have discussed this matter with him, and I think he is in agreement with the position I am taking this afternoon with respect to not concluding the debate on the bill. I am not for one minute saying he agrees with me in some of the other comments I made about the government's ineptitude in dealing with this situation.

For that reason, honourable senators, I may later on, when we know something about the activities of the government seminar conductors, seek to speak again on this bill notwithstanding rule 28 which, of course, will require leave of the Senate. I may seek that leave when I know what the government intends to put before Parliament in respect to this situation.

There are obvious questions here. Will the seminar conductors provide Parliament with a report? Will they say, "We have introduced this bill. Here are some of the reactions. We think we have been silly again"? Or will they say, "Wait until this goes to committee, and then we will have the officials there and you can question them"?

I would like to know before we decide on this bill in this chamber on second reading whether the government really believes in it. I do not know whether we have a report of that kind. I made some inquiries, but was unable to get an answer. Naturally we want to know whether the government intends to introduce amendments to the bill as it is before us. If that is the case, the government should not wait until the bill is in committee. We must know what the government intends to do about this very important matter of trademark protection in Canada.

We are told that the government is now going to give a greater responsibility to the marketplace in the protection or otherwise, the validity or otherwise, of the effective licensing or otherwise of trademarks. We have heard that story before from this government. All of us recall that we were told by the Prime Minister that the concept of marketplace decisions is gone; that the private sector philosophy and the marketplace philosophy has failed. Now we are told we are going back to that.

• (1500)

However, this is not the only bill in which we find this sudden conversion—the same kind of conversion that occurred on the road to Damascus. I was reminded by the Leader of the Government, while dealing with another bill, that St. Paul himself was converted on the road to Damascus. In that case it was a last-minute conversion, and perhaps this is what we are faced with here.

Senator Godfrey realistically and quite clearly stated:

There is no way that this bill can become law during this session of Parliament and there is, therefore, no urgency in considering the bill at the second reading stage.

The sponsor of the bill said that there was no urgency in considering the bill at the second reading stage, and I, therefore, take the liberty of asking leave to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 13, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of establishing a department of the Government of Canada to deal with all matters relating to aging.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I do not know if you will be pleased but I intend to speak very briefly about the inquiry made by Senator Croll on January 30 last in which he suggested the establishment of a federal department to centralize all complex problems concerning old people. Senator Marshall also thoroughly discussed that proposal and I think that he has at least supported its principle. Today I will merely discuss two points which I feel are important.

First I want to refer to the general attitude of the Senate in recent years concerning the underprivileged citizens of our community. Since Bill C-60, which deals among other things with the Senate, its membership and its proceedings, was presented last year, our institution has made the headlines on several occasions. Traditionally our friends the newspapermen have always looked upon the Upper Chamber as being a group of experts, politicians, financiers or businessmen much more concerned with important constitutional or financial matters than with the problems of the underprivileged. It is obviously a serious mistake. Senator Croll's proposal now provides us with the opportunity to set the facts in their true light and in doing so to pay a well deserved tribute to our colleague who during the past years has been the promoter of the Senate special committee on the problem of retirement which we now have under consideration.

Indeed all along his career he has never failed to defend the interests of the workers and the underprivileged in our community. He has set up various special committees such as the committees on aging, poverty, the guaranteed minimum income and consumer protection. These studies gave rise to some proposals, several of which are now incorporated in our social security legislation. I think it was only fair to mention those facts to say out loud that the underprivileged of the working classes have always found constant support here in the Senate in recent years.

[Senator Grosart.]

The second point I want to deal with is the following. Members of the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies are now hard at work. Whatever the possibilities of a general election, we intend to continue those studies to the end. Because of that, of course, I do not want to comment on the suggestion of Senator Croll that we have a special department devoted only to the problems of the underprivileged. I would like to add that according to the studies carried out to date and after hearing the many witnesses who appeared before us, the problems of the aged turned out to be very complex, very broad problems relating mainly to two aspects: the psychological aspect, and the economic aspect. Without going into details, I just want to say that that might be the most important finding we made. When some ten to twelve years ago we passed the Canada Pension Plan Act I remember quite well it was being said at the time that the Canada Pension Plan as well as the Quebec Pension Plan would become a supplement to pension plans in effect today in the private sector.

The most important thing we found was that 61 per cent of all Canadian workers—men, women, white collar workers, blue collar workers—are not covered today by any private pension plan. That I think is the most important finding, and it raises the following problem. Nowadays people must retire at 65 in the public and private sectors. They have not always contributed long enough to the Canada Pension Plan to receive any benefits. This means that while there are about 1.4 million people over 65 in Canada, according to the present figures, about three quarters of them live near the poverty line because they do not draw old age pension benefits. Very few of them receive Canada Pension Plan benefits.

Another factor which probably prompted Senator Croll to examine the problems of retirement is the fact that the American Congress passed legislation last January 1 which provides that people in the public sector are no longer forced to retire at a certain age, and that compulsory retirement age in the private sector will increase from 65 to 70. This has created the present situation.

However, I do not want to go any further as concerns the problems we are studying as I cannot say today whether the recommendation of Senator Croll is the ideal solution. But I do know one thing, and that is that we have enough information today to be able to say that some action should be taken as soon as possible by the federal government, even though, on the whole, these problems come under provincial jurisdiction. I believe that the federal Department of Social Welfare and the provinces should discuss this matter as soon as possible. That is all I have to say on this point for the moment.

However, I want to tell you that in my opinion the special committee is doing an excellent job. We have been sitting since last year and we want to study this problem in depth. As for all other investigations made by the Senate in nearly every area, we want to submit a report which will meet the expectations of those who have placed their confidence in our ability.

I would like to close by saying that many social changes have occurred in the last few years. Those of our generation have never heard so much talk about the problems of the quality of life, the importance of the environment and the freedom of choice of individual citizens for all the decisions that must be made. I believe we are about to create a new type of society where moral and human values will be more important than material values, as was the case in the earlier days of our generation.

In any event, I believe that in his intervention, Senator Croll has been very consistent with the incessant efforts he has made throughout his career, whether as a member of Parliament, as a minister in Ontario or as a senator, and under his leadership, when our work is over, we want to be able to submit comprehensive solutions to very serious problems which concern the most disadvantaged members of our society.

Once again, I urge you never to let anyone tell you that the Senate was not in the forefront to study these problems. We have never cut ourselves from the working classes and I believe we have given ample proof of this. I would like once again to take this opportunity to pay homage to Senator Croll who has been one of the promoters of all types of social measures in the Senate.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.
[Translation]

Honourable senators, I do not know whether the question I am about to raise is one of privilege or one which should be heard on the Orders of the Day. However difficult it may be, I will try to explain myself.

I want to refer to rail transport.

[English]

It is said that for one to recover successfully from a stroke one must control one's temper and avoid becoming too emotional. Well, I don't anticipate getting too emotional but I sometimes find it very difficult to control my temper when it comes to the question of rail transportation, especially VIA Rail.

It appears that since the inception of VIA Rail, travel by train has become almost intolerable. It was my hope that VIA Rail would improve rail passenger service, but the mistakes tolerated for many years are being repeated daily.

At this point I want to describe what happened to me last Monday on my trip here from my home in New Brunswick. I left home at 9 o'clock in the morning, scheduled to arrive in Ottawa at midnight. I do that every week, with some difficulty.

Last Monday there was a derailment about 50 miles east of Quebec City, and our train just sat there for an hour and a half before the conductor finally got the order to go back 103 miles and change lines. The delay resulted from a misunderstanding between Edmundston and Quebec City. Nobody seems to be the boss. Nobody could give the order. Finally, we rode back 103 miles, which took two and a half hours. We then changed lines and got onto the regular main line. We were held up for 35 minutes at L'Islet—I do not know why—but we were told that the Montreal train would wait for us in Quebec City.

Finally they told us that the train to Montreal had left, that we were too late. The conductor told us that when we arrived in Quebec City we should call at the ticket office and they would provide us with sleeping quarters and supper. Altogether we were 27 passengers, 17 of whom were going to Montreal. On this particular train there is no dining car. They serve only hot dogs and hamburgers. The passengers have to eat what is prepared in Toronto the week before.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): That is a fact. That is nothing new. However, we were happy with that. At least it was something to eat—bones, or something like that.

Senator Buckwold: That must have been hard to swallow.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Honourable senators have not heard the end of this story yet.

When we arrived in Quebec City, we were supposed to go to the ticket office and they would look after us. When we got off the train a man said, "Hurry up, all passengers for Montreal have to go to the CPR station. You have only 10 minutes." He told us that there were taxis to take us. The distance from Ste-Foy to Ancienne Lorette is, I think, about five miles, and we had 10 minutes in which to cover that distance.

We got into the taxis, which I would say flew too low on the way. There were six or seven taxis, and I was in the one that made the train by two minutes. The last one missed it. I do not know what happened to those three or four passengers. VIA-CP—it is now VIA-CN—would not wait the four or five minutes for those other passengers.

The group of us who arrived in time boarded the train. There was no conductor, and I was afraid to walk far on the train because I was not too sure of my balance. I then went to the door and beckoned a trainman, who came. He was a smart looking young fellow. I said to him, "We are 15 or 17 passengers and we have not had anything to eat since 8 o'clock this morning. Is there anything to eat on the train?" He replied, "No, there is no food on the train." I then said, "What are we going to do? We still have another three or four hours to go." He was very sympathetic and very polite. Another trainman came along, and he could see that I was somewhat put out about the service. I said, "Look, mister, there are 15 passengers here who have had no food." He said, "What do you expect me to do—cry over it?"

I will not tell honourable senators what I told him, because I do not think it would escape the censure of the Senate. However, that is the sort of treatment one gets from VIA. Passengers may not get that treatment every day; they do most of the time. It really burned me when he said, "What do you expect me to do—cry over it?" I cannot accept that at all.

The young man was very pleasant. Finally he took our orders, with the result that when we arrived at Trois-Rivières two hours later lunch boxes were available, and at least we were able to eat. I was very thankful for that.

But this is only one example. That same train took about 35 minutes to travel three miles. We stopped, I think, six times, and I have no idea why. This was within five or six miles of Montreal.

Senator Walker: Were there toilet facilities?

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Yes, but since we had eaten no food we did not need them.

It is true, honourable senators, that the new management has painted the trains, repaired some of the old cars and made other changes. However, the travelling public does not care whether the trains are painted red, blue or yellow; they simply want reasonable comfort together with a little courtesy. Safety is also a major factor, but adherence to the timetable is the essence of success. The travelling public accepts the fact that nothing is perfect; it is prepared to accept the fact that sometimes things can go wrong, but certainly this should not happen every day.

In the last 15 years there was no shortage of passengers; people were travelling more than ever before. All you had to do was go to an airport or a bus station and you found that the old and the young, students and retired citizens—in fact, everybody—were travelling. But even during that time railroad passenger service deteriorated to the point of bankruptcy of the companies. There are several reasons for this. Management lost contact with, and respect for, the client, the passenger. It took the attitude that consultation with the passenger was unnecessary. Their attitude is one of, "You get aboard and we will tell you when we leave, and when you reach your destination we will tell you that it is time to get off. You can take it or leave it." As a result, thousands of travellers left the railroads.

Then, honourable senators, if you do travel by train, you have to sit tight. Even if you are stalled for one or two hours, you must not ask any questions because it seems that you are not supposed to know anything. You are only a passenger! I could give many other examples. Eventually your train may leave, one or perhaps two hours late. Once again you are not told the reason and you must not ask any questions because, as I said, you are only a passenger. You are not supposed to say anything.

Then you arrive—as happened to me recently—in Ottawa to find yourself in a station which is two miles from the city centre. The train arrived at midnight, an hour late. There were approximately 100 passengers and the available transportation consisted of only three taxis.

VIA had left us stranded in the middle of the night with no transportation.

I have tried to find out, honourable senators, what VIA stands for, but nobody seems to know. I have asked perhaps 100 people—in Montreal, on the trains, at different stations—what VIA stands for and nobody has been able to tell me. I am of the opinion that VIA will be short-lived—I would say that it was doomed before birth—unless the company's attitude and policy is changed.

We have to bear in mind—and this is very important—that the chairman of VIA and his associates are the very people who were responsible for the failure of passenger train service in Canada. Now they are responsible for the destinies of VIA, and all I can do is wish them luck. I am of the opinion that many things are taking place under this new management that it is not aware of, and it is these things that are destroying the structure of management. I have many facts to justify what I am saying.

VIA, naturally, is facing a lot of problems. In the first place, it owns only the equipment. It has no roadbed, no track and no stations. Then there is rivalry between what I will call VIA-CP and VIA-CN. These two bodies do not work together. We had an example of that last Monday, when the VIA-CP train would not wait for the passengers of the VIA-CN train. I know from talking to people on the train that there are serious rivalries, because the CP people do not accept the management of the CN, although they are now in the same company.

VIA has trouble with unions, and big problems with the Railway Transport Committee. The employees have lost faith in the management, and train personnel are not interested in their work any more, although most of them mean well. This is due to a lack of communication with management, and the fact that they are left in the dark with many questions unanswered about the future.

I said that VIA does not have any roadbed. This is true. In the meantime, however, the people that own the roadbeds are the CN or the CP, and the passenger service has to yield priority to the freight service. There are places where passenger trains have to wait for hours sometimes to let a freight train go through, yet I have no doubt that this organization will spend hundreds of millions of dollars of public money before it collapses.

Let me say a word before I close about the management structure of VIA. VIA is a new company. The chairman is Mr. Roberts, and in addition there are six vice-presidents across Canada. I do not dispute the salaries of the vice-chairmen. What I am concerned about is the expenses that arise from those appointments, because when you have a vice-chairman you have to have an assistant vice-chairman, secretaries, and a whole staff that goes with him. That costs money. The first vice-president is Mr. Shute, in charge of operations. Then there is Mr. Campbell, who is in charge of marketing; Mr. Raftus is the vice-president in Moncton; Mr. Moisan is in Montreal; Mr. Campbell is in Toronto; and Mr. Murray is in Winnipeg. One wonders sometimes what a company does with six vice-presidents. Certainly, they have lots of time, and they are making tremendous efforts to reduce the passenger service as much as possible.

I don't intend at this point to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. It took some three months before I received an answer to the last question I asked. It is frustrating, given the manpower and money expended on VIA Rail, to see it going from bad to worse. I am only pleased that most senators don't have to patronize VIA Rail.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I do not intend to detain the Senate very long on this point. I merely want to make it clear that the honourable senator's experience of Monday last is not an isolated one. I have received more than one complaint from people who have had the occasion to travel from Nova Scotia to Montreal and Toronto on VIA Rail. On one occasion, they ran out of food. On another occasion, the train was very, very late. Passengers, instead of arriving at Toronto some time in the afternoon, arrived in time for a late breakfast the next morning. There is a multitude of similar complaints.

I use the train quite often for short journeys. As perhaps some senators will know, I live on the main CNR line at Truro, and consequently it is convenient for me to travel by train. The main trains from Nova Scotia to Montreal are frequently late. Not so long ago I had occasion to catch a train out of Halifax on two successive days. If memory serves me rightly, it was the Scotian on both occasions, and on both occasions the trains were kept standing in the station at Halifax for a considerable period beyond the scheduled time of departure. On the second occasion I was able to elicit, with great difficulty, the alleged reason for the delay, that being that the locomotive was not ready and consequently could not be hooked on to the train any sooner than it in fact was. Incidentally, the weather was very cold and there was no heat in the trains during this waiting period.

When I am home on a workday, I walk across the main line at Truro about the time that the noon trains coming from Montreal and Halifax pass, and day after day they are late. Day after day I hear complaints of the kind we have already heard.

I should like to say that it has been my experience that the train crews themselves are anxious to do what is right. They are frustrated because they are not given the opportunity or the equipment to do what they know they would like to do and what should be done. While I have some rather hard words for various levels of management, I should like it to be known that in my opinion at least the actual train crews are not the people who are to blame. Indeed, I think they are doing the best they can with the facilities and assistance they have.

I therefore feel it should be emphasized that this shocking experience of Senator Fournier's is not an isolated event. If the VIA people wish to gain passengers from other means of transportation, as I hope will be the case, they will certainly have to do a great deal of improving to the facilities and the conveniences which they make it possible for their train crews to supply to passengers.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I must admit that I have been a little discouraged by the length of time taken to talk about this problem. I do not intend to denigrate the importance to the individual of the inconvenience that has been caused. All of us could tell horrendous stories about transportation, whether by railroad, by air or by some other means. Things do happen.

The point I should like to make is that we have just had representations from the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, and it would seem appropriate to have that honourable gentleman and his committee take a look at the particular problems that have been raised concerning transportation. There might be a more positive reaction to that than to the mere expression of his opinion to this body today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, because I have been particularly referred to, perhaps I might be permitted to comment. If the Senate were kind enough to adopt the usual motion—and I would not mind moving it—I am sure it would be a great pleasure to do just that.

So far, not having the power to act independently of the Senate, I have confined myself to correspondence with the chairman of VIA. I should certainly be delighted, with the support of the Senate and the committee, to conduct some sort of inquiry or investigation into the matter.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, with great deference to Senator Smith, I would just remind him, and other senators, that it is the prerogative of a senator to bring forth that kind of motion for discussion and for a decision by the Senate. I would suggest to Senator Smith that he put the motion.

Senator Flynn: Why not do it yourself?

Senator Argue: I am not the chairman of the committee.

Senator Flynn: That does not matter.

Senator Argue: I realize that, but, personally, I would be much happier to see the chairman of the committee, after consultation with the members of that committee, put that kind of motion to the Senate and take that kind of initiative. Certainly, somebody else could do it, but it would seem to me more appropriate for the chairman to do so.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I have no objection to doing it but, judging by what has happened to suggestions I have put forward to this house on other occasions, I think it would be much more likely to bear fruit if someone else put the motion forward.

Senator Argue: Just try it. This one will work.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Having now been assured of the support of some rather able and influential senators, I feel much more inclined to risk—

An Hon. Senator: You can't go too far off track.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith (Colchester): —the chance of success in bringing forward such a motion.

• (1430)

I wish I could have heard the interventions from the other side. I think they may have been worth replying to, but I did not hear them.

Senator Perrault: Right off the track.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, March 5, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to give you a brief outline of the work schedule for next week.

When we return next Monday evening, Senator Hayden will move second reading of Bill S-14, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency, and we will continue with the other items on the order paper.

The committee schedule for next week is quite heavy. On Tuesday the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline will meet at 10 a.m. on Bill S-12, to amend the National Energy Board Act; and at 10.30 a.m. the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution will hold an in camera meeting. The Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 2 p.m.; the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-15, the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act; and the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Subcommittee on Off-Track Betting will also meet at 2.30 p.m. The Health, Welfare and Science Committee will meet at 4 p.m. on Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act. The witness at that meeting will be the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

On Wednesday the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will meet at 9.30 a.m. and 2.30 p.m.; and the National Finance Committee will meet at 3.30 p.m. The Agriculture Committee and the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline will both meet when the Senate rises.

On Thursday there are three committees scheduled to meet at 9.30 a.m.—the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, the National Finance Committee, and the Special Committee on the Northern Pipeline. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m.

Senator Flynn: I can see no reason, from what the deputy leader has said, that justifies sitting on Monday rather than on Tuesday as is the normal practice in this place. I think that the Senate deserves an explanation unless, in the view of the deputy leader, we are not entitled to an explanation and we should just have the same total faith on this side of the house as exists on the other.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I thought the Honourable Leader of the Opposition would be impressed by the lengthy list of committee work for next week.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

Senator Langlois: That is ample justification for coming back on Monday.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

Senator Langlois: Under our rules, Monday is a normal sitting day.

Senator Flynn: Go on; say something enlightening.

Senator Langlois: I have said quite a bit. If you would care to listen, perhaps you would understand something.

Senator Flynn: I heard.

Senator Perrault: Listen with comprehension.

Senator Langlois: I have also announced that one bill is likely to come to us from the other place on Monday. There is also a possibility of a second one coming to us next week.

Senator Flynn: Even at that, it will not come on Monday night. It will have to receive first reading on Monday, but we could not proceed with it on Monday night.

Senator Perrault: With your co-operation.

Senator Langlois: With leave, we could.

Senator Flynn: There is no reason why.

Senator Langlois: Just because you don't want to co-operate we should rather not sit, according to you.

Senator Flynn: Not at all. The deputy leader is not frank with the Senate. He has given no reason to justify departing from the normal practice of sitting on Tuesday evening. He has not said anything to justify the change contained in the motion presented today.

Senator Langlois: I could object to the honourable senator's saying that I was not being frank with the Senate, but since it comes from that source I am not at all affected by such a statement.

Senator Flynn: I know that.

Senator Langlois: I am sure that every honourable senator in this place will understand that it is about time one here puts the interests of the Senate before one's own leisure.

Senator Flynn: Oh, no. The honourable senator says he is not affected by the source, which indicated he was not frank with the Senate. I can understand that, because you are not being frank with the Senate. You are not giving us any valid reason for departing from the usual practice of sitting on Tuesday. I don't know if you have spoken to your colleagues on your side and told them secrets to justify this change of practice, but you certainly have not said anything in the Senate that would justify it. In any case, the record will speak for itself. We are fed up with the secret explanations and manoeuvres that have taken place so many times.

Senator Perrault: I know that all honourable senators will be surprised and rather distressed at the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition, who is usually unfailingly courteous and co-operative.

Senator Flynn: I have not changed.

Senator Perrault: The events of the next few hours may provide the rationale for the proposal to meet on Monday night.

Senator Flynn: Again?

Senator Perrault: I am not inferring the possibility of some event that may involve the electorate. There is a bill before the other place; I understand there has been some discussion there that may lead to an all-party agreement. Should the bill come to this place, it is a measure that I hope will result in the same degree of amity and co-operation that appears to exist in the other chamber.

Senator Flynn: I shall be able to determine that better on Monday night.

Senator Olson: I do not wish to add to our workload, but I hope it was an oversight that the deputy leader did not mention that the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline has scheduled a meeting for 9.30 a.m. on Tuesday, March 6.

Senator Flynn: That does not make any difference.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Senator Perrault: How many divisions do you have?

Senator Flynn: Not many, like the Pope.

Motion agreed to, on division.

[Senator Flynn.]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POLICY RESPECTING HOSTILITIES BETWEEN CHINA AND VIETNAM—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have the reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Bosa concerning Canadian policy respecting hostilities between China and Vietnam.

On February 18 a formal démarche was made in Peking, on instructions from Ottawa, in which the Chinese authorities and the Vietnamese authorities, through the Vietnamese Embassy in Peking, were notified of the Canadian government's deep concern over the increased resort to armed force in Indo-China, first with the Vietnamese invasion of Cambodia and more recently by the Chinese incursion into Vietnam. The presentations made at that time called for an urgent cessation of hostilities, a withdrawal of foreign troops from all territories outside national borders, and expressed Canada's hope that consideration would be given to a political approach to the settlement of the problems concerned.

A comparable presentation, which asked all those with influence to join Canada in urging the exercise of restraint by all those engaged in hostilities, was also made to the Soviet government by the Canadian ambassador in Moscow.

● (1440)

On February 23, Canada joined with Australia and New Zealand in supporting a request for an urgent meeting of the United Nations Security Council to consider the situation in South East Asia. On the following day, our ambassador at the United Nations delivered a statement before the Security Council outlining in detail Canada's concern over recent developments in Asia, urging the Security Council to take appropriate action and asking that all parties take advantage of the United Nations Secretary General's offer to assist.

Canada will continue to hold consultations with other countries concerned with a view to exploring on an urgent basis all possible means available to restore peace and security in South East Asia.

LOTO CANADA

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES—PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Roblin asked a supplementary question in connection with the National Hockey League and the plan to upgrade the Winnipeg Arena. He asked if the offer the federal government made in respect of that matter was without consultation with the National Hockey League.

In response to that question I would like to say that it is certainly no secret that the question of the World Hockey Association clubs joining in the National Hockey League has been discussed by both leagues on and off for a considerable length of time. It is also no secret that the National Hockey League will not accept an application from a club which does not have an arena capable of seating 14,000 people.

Certain owners from both leagues are interested in some form of merger and it is a subject of continuing interest. The Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport has been forthright in championing the cause of Edmonton, Winnipeg and Quebec City with the National Hockey League. In effect, by offering to help the proposed Winnipeg Arena expansion, the federal government and the city are allowing the Winnipeg Jets to assure the National Hockey League governors, in the words of the minister: "Grant us a franchise and we will have a 15,000-capacity arena."

In connection with the federal government's offer of aid under certain circumstances for the expansion of arenas in these three Canadian cities, I should like to repeat again that an arena of this size is beneficial to amateur groups for attracting national and international functions, which would give an opportunity to have top calibre athletes compete in an activity. An adequate arena generates growth of a sport in any area.

All levels of government benefit from taxation related to arenas and their events.

Arenas with seating capacity for 15,000 are able to attract national, international, political and social events. These facilities require a professional franchise in order to support their maintenance and capital costs.

Canadian teams are presently outnumbered substantially in the National Hockey League with only three out of 17 teams based in Canada. Hockey is a Canadian game and, in the view of the minister, three additional teams would give a better balance, especially if there is a Canadian division.

More Canadians would have the opportunity to view live Canadian professional hockey, and this would provide an identifiable opportunity to other regions of the country and would have a positive economic effect on the regions in which the teams are located by creating new jobs, both in the construction and ongoing operations.

I should like to suggest to honourable senators that they might wish to acquire a copy of a departmental publication entitled "Canada's Hosting Policy: Sport Event Guidelines." That publication outlines the comprehensive assistance available, not just to three cities to build arena capacity to permit entry into the National Hockey League, and for other purposes, but to centres all across Canada where certain criteria can be met. Part Two of this document is particularly significant. Part Two states:

The following factors will be considered when applications to receive federal support for major amateur sport events are assessed. Collectively, they will govern the level of federal assistance recommended for each event.

1. Benefit of the event in terms of the sport(s) in Canada and of Canadians in general

What benefit will the featured sport(s) derive from hosting this event? This assessment will include the perceived benefit accruing to athletes, coaches and officials in each sport concerned, as well as the more general benefit gained by the Canadian public.

2. Net Operating Costs

Included in this assessment will be estimates of such revenues as gate receipts, sales of television rights, private sector sponsorship, entry fees, etc . . . , against projected operating costs.

3. New Facility Construction

If a request for federal support of a major amateur sport event includes a requirement to construct new facilities—

Senator Flynn: Did you say "amateur"?

Senator Perrault: This is the amateur side of the program, Senator Flynn. It continues:

—this portion of the submission will be carefully examined to determine the need for the proposed facility. If the requirement is considered valid in terms of the event itself, a further assessment will be made of such factors as:

—benefit to the local or broader community in terms of post-event utilization;

—employment opportunities provided during the construction phase;

—ongoing operation and maintenance costs.

There are a number of other criteria, and I do not intend to burden honourable senators with the complete list. The fourth factor reads as follows:

4. Involvement by Other Levels of Government

Under normal circumstances, the federal government will continue to encourage a one-third cost-sharing agreement among federal, provincial and municipal governments in respect of the total net capital and operating costs. Therefore, the degree of interest expressed by other levels of government in a particular event will affect the amount of support contributed by the federal government.

Honourable senators, I have given some of the guidelines for assistance to amateur sport to indicate that the federal government is prepared to consider applications for assistance in various parts of the country. The National Hockey League arena offer reflects only one facet of a very comprehensive and excellent program developed by the Honourable Iona Campagnolo.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED MOVE OF CANADIAN PENSION COMMISSION— QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall and Senator Forsey asked a question relating to the planned relocation of the portfolio headquarters, including the move of the Canadian Pension Commission to Prince Edward Island.

In reply to that, I can say that I have received a communication signed by the Honourable Daniel J. MacDonald, which reads, in part, as follows:

I recently received a letter from Mr. E. C. Coley, Dominion President of the Royal Canadian Legion, expressing essentially the same concerns voiced by Senator Marshall in the aforementioned question.

Your own comment that several honourable senators had received similar representations leads me to the conclusion that Senator Marshall and his colleagues would be best informed by receiving a copy of my reply to Mr. Coley in its entirety. Accordingly this copy is attached herewith.

I trust this will be satisfactory.

There is a two-page letter attached addressed to Mr. Coley. I can read it now or have it included in today's record, whatever honourable senators wish.

Senator Flynn: Include it in today's record.

Senator Perrault: All right. The minister's letter to me is in both official languages.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Before we decide what to do with that letter, could the leader tell me whether it is the letter in which the Minister of Veterans Affairs states that he is doing his best to make sure that the disturbance to veterans is minimal?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I cannot say that, because in the course of his duties the minister sends out letters of all types and descriptions on a wide range of matters. In paragraph (2) of the letter, he does state:

—under no circumstances would I provide continuing support to the move unless I was sure that it would involve only a minimal disruption of service to our veteran clients.

He goes on to talk in terms of effectuating a smooth transition, and so forth.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I can say to the leader that that identifies the letter satisfactorily for me.

Senator Forsey: As a supplementary, may I ask whether there is some expectation of our getting, within a reasonable time, answers to the other questions asked by Senator Marshall?

The Leader of the Government was kind enough to send me a copy of the letter from the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I noted that it dealt with one particular question out of a large number which Senator Marshall asked relating to these matters. It dealt with Question No. 66 in our Minutes of the Proceedings, but it does not deal at all with Questions 61 to 65 or 67 and 68. I wonder whether some response will be forthcoming to those, because they seem to be very much germane to the general issue which, certainly, the Dominion President of the Royal Canadian Legion raised in his letter to me, and I presume in his letter also to Senator Marshall and various other members of the house.

Senator Perrault: Presumably you are making reference to the written questions on the order paper.

Senator Forsey: Yes.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: I shall certainly urge the minister to provide replies as quickly as possible. However, there are a number of assurances given with respect to the proposed move in the letter to which I make reference today.

Senator Forsey: I must point out to the leader that they are very general assurances and the questions are very specific, indeed. There is only one specific question which is specifically answered. There may be good reason for that, but I hope the answers to the other questions will be forthcoming before the not very far off, not very divine event to which I referred yesterday.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Senator Buckwold asked a question regarding the increased interest rate on government annuities.

I have been advised that the 1975 increase in the rate of return on Canadian government annuities applied to annuities in payment as well as to those which had not yet matured. A further increase in the rate of interest on government annuities could hardly be justified on the basis of 1978 yields on long-term government bonds, since in fact those yields were lower than those prevailing in 1975 when the annuities rates were increased. The increase in short-term interest rates over the last few months is due to special circumstances which are not expected to continue. Interest rates are reviewed periodically. Although the government would be prepared to consider increasing the rate of return on government annuities if the situation warranted it, no such step is contemplated in the near future.

BEEF IMPORT BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Sparrow for the second reading of Bill S-13, to control the importation of beef into Canada.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate yesterday to provide myself with the opportunity of reading the comments by the sponsor of the bill and by Senator Roblin. I was unavoidably absent from the chamber when those two speeches were made, and I have now had an opportunity to read them. Yesterday I heard Senator Hays, and I must say that I concur, by and large, with the comments that have been made.

It seems to me that this particular bill and the process leading up to it are good examples of the work that the Senate can and does do both in its investigative role and in its legislative role. Back in the summer of 1977 when we perceived there was a particular problem in the beef industry, the Senate committee proceeded to study the question. That study could have been done by a royal commission. I think the committee did a good piece of work. It produced a sound report. Now we see the next step in the work that a Senate committee can do which cannot be done by a royal commission.

Having made this study and having made recommendations, we are now acting on those recommendations and proceeding with a bill. I do not claim it is a measure that will solve all the problems in the beef industry, but it is certainly a forward step and one which had virtually unanimous support at the meetings of the committee.

The details of the bill itself have been discussed, and I will not go through them. The important thing here is that when we started this study we were at the other end of the beef cycle. At that point and for some time prior the beef producers in Canada were in fact subsidizing the beef consumers. It was inevitable that shortages would develop at a later date. It was impossible for beef producers to continue producing beef at the prices they were then obtaining on the market. Many of them went bankrupt. Many others simply disposed of their herds and got out of the beef business. It was obvious then that the pendulum would swing the other way and at a later date we would end up with shortages. That is where we are now.

At this stage consumer prices have skyrocketed. I do not believe that is in the interest of either the producers or the consumers. What is required is some stabilization. This bill is one of the steps leading to that stabilization. We must instal confidence in the beef producers that if they stay in the business they will have long-term protection or, at the very least, stabilization. Unless we can provide them with that confidence we will keep on with these boom and bust cycles of very low prices and then extremely high prices. This bill is one of the steps to provide that confidence. The beef producer will know that if he stays in the business he will not find himself at a later date with a great influx of beef from other sources at the very time he could be averaging out his long-term income.

I suspect it is more difficult to convince consumers of the advantage of long-term stabilization, particularly at this point in time when we are, as I have mentioned, at the other end of the cycle. Prices are high, and consumers might resist a measure which, in their view, would prevent an averaging down of price. Nevertheless, I am convinced that this bill is in the long-term interests of consumers, but I think we shall have a particular job to do in explaining its broad impact. It is my hope that the committee meetings will be wide open, and that the committee will hear all who wish to appear before it. I know that has always been the practice, but in this case I hope that the committee will bend over backwards to accommodate everyone. Any Canadian who wants to appear, should be given the opportunity to do so. We should not attempt to rush the process. In order to be successful, the bill needs the endorsement of as many people as possible.

I presume the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. We can shortly begin our hearings, but I hope we will allow a sufficiently long period of time to enable those who wish to appear to do so, and that we invite broad representation.

I commend the bill to the Senate.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Sparrow speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the honourable senator who has just resumed his seat.

Yesterday Senator Molgat questioned Senator Hays with respect to his reference to the superior quality of beef imported from the United States, and he did so in such a manner as to indicate he was not in agreement. I thought he might make some remarks in connection with that matter at this time. I am interested in knowing his views with respect to Senator Hays' assertion.

Senator Molgat: Senator Bosa, the tone and wording of my questioning yesterday did indicate that I was not in complete agreement with what Senator Hays said about the quality of American beef. However, I have to say that I suppose it is a question of taste. My own taste is for Canadian beef rather than American beef, although once it is put into hamburger no one would really know the difference. Hamburger is becoming the prime use of beef in the country.

There is a point in the reply that Senator Hays made with respect to the extra feeding. If I remember correctly, he indicated that in the United States cattle that would normally come for slaughter would be fed for another 40 to 60 days in order to add more fat. Whether that is, in fact, the right thing to do is debatable because, by and large, people do not eat the fat; the fat is cut off and, in many cases, is wasted. I wonder whether, in our present society—where we are finding more and more instances of shortage—it is sound and proper economics to put excess fat on cattle. Perhaps we should be going in the other direction and feeding them to just the proper amount.

● (1500)

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, in closing the debate on second reading, may I first thank Senator Molgat, Senator Hays and Senator Roblin for their participation and contributions. They indicated to me—and, I am sure, to all honourable senators—that they have a great knowledge of the cattle industry and of the problems affecting producers, consumers and the exporting countries.

I am sorry that Senator Roblin is not in his seat today to accept some of the accolades that I shall be passing out. In reflecting some of the concern of those who might appear before the committee as witnesses, he particularly mentioned the compatibility of the bill with our GATT obligations. I am aware of the fact, as are the members of the committee, that some problems might be created by relating the bill to GATT. However, I believe there is a way of overcoming them.

Senator Roblin mentioned that there might be a problem with regard to live cattle, particularly as the bill affects our trade with the United States and reflects the concern of some cattle associations in this country. We shall have to look closely at that matter. As Senator Molgat stated, the committee will be open to all representations, and I am sure there will be important discussions on the provisions of the bill concerning live cattle.

Senator Roblin suggested that there might also be problems with the signal price that would be established by the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture, following discussions with consumer groups and other organizations. I appreciate the fact that there might very well be a problem in establishing a signal price that would be fair to producers, consumers, and, of course, our trading partners in the world. I want to assure honourable senators, and particularly Senator Roblin, that I, as the sponsor of the bill, and also the committee members—many of whom are very knowledgeable about this country's agricultural industry—will take a close look at that aspect, and there might have to be amendments to make the bill compatible with and fair to all the groups I have mentioned.

Those honourable senators who heard Senator Hays speak yesterday, or who have read his speech in Hansard, will be aware of his expertise in the agricultural industry. He is a former Minister of Agriculture, and has had direct involvement with agriculture as a rancher and farmer.

Senator Hays is the only Canadian who has managed, by devoting a great deal of time, effort and money to the cattle industry, to develop a breed of cattle of his very own that is registered in the herd books of this country. The breed is called Hays Converters, and it has contributed, and will continue to contribute, a great deal to the cattle industry in this country by enabling it to market a better product and thus become more profitable.

Such ambition on the part of Senator Hays will, I hope, counteract any adverse comments which might be made in the future to the effect that Canada produces inferior beef. I, for one, do not believe that we in Canada produce inferior beef. In some categories we might lack a certain quality in our beef, because of weather conditions, feed, and other aspects, but, on the whole, I believe that the quality of beef produced in Canada is competitive with that produced anywhere.

Senator Hays asked whether we do, or do not, want a beef industry? I believe all of us would say yes, we do want a beef industry. In my introduction of the bill, I stated that the contribution of the beef industry to the gross national product was 12 per cent. That is a high percentage. If we have to import most of our beef products, we might in the future be in much greater financial trouble than we are at present. Yes, we do want a beef industry in this country, because it plays an important role in Canada's business community.

It is well known that Senator Molgat understands and is concerned about the problems of the beef industry, on behalf of both the producers and consumers. He and the other honourable senators who have spoken are members of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture. Senator Argue also is to be commended for his work as chairman of that committee. He possesses a great deal of knowledge of many of the problems affecting agriculture in this country.

Senator Molgat said he believed the bill can relieve three problem areas. He particularly mentioned two, namely, those of producers and consumers. Although he did not refer directly to the problems in the export of beef, I believe the bill will treat producers fairly in that respect. He suggested that amendments could be made, and I am sure the members of the committee will look at all suggestions that might make the bill a better one.

I commend the bill to honourable senators. I believe that it will protect, and treat fairly, the three groups I have mentioned—the cattle producers and the consumers of this country, and those nations which historically have exported to this country.

Motion agreed to and the bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Sparrow moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL SESSION, LISBON, PORTUGAL—
DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 20, 1979, the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator McDonald calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-fourth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held at Lisbon, Portugal, from 25th to 30th November, 1978, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I shall detain you only briefly. Before I commence, may I be permitted to refer to a discussion that took place earlier in this chamber concerning rail transportation problems in eastern Canada. Having experienced the difficulty in years gone by, I fully sympathize with Senator Edgar Fournier who at times is thoroughly dependent on that type of transportation.

• (1510)

Within the last couple of years Senator Fournier and I have had the opportunity of travelling together on European trains. While he did not say anything to me, I know that at the time he was thoroughly envious of the efficiency, speed and service we were experiencing. Nevertheless, it is with nostalgia that I recall occasions in the early forties when ten or twelve of us dressed in blue, with as many kit bags, would board the Canadian National train at either Moncton or Mont Joli and indicate to the conductor that he would be quite welcome to get out of his chamber and make room for us. Subsequently we would spend the night in an utterly miserable fashion. But this, with the years, has become a fond memory, and I wish that Senator Fournier could have another 35 to 40 years in which his memories of last week's harassments on the Canadian National could mellow.

Honourable senators, in speaking to the North Atlantic Assembly meeting in Lisbon some months ago, may I first of all correct the record of the Senate at page 546. There was indeed four members of the Senate who were delegates to the Assembly, and I was one of them. I try to be unobtrusive and not speak unless I have something to say and perhaps I overdo it, but nevertheless I was one of the delegation. I think the distinguished chairman of the Canadian North Atlantic Assembly Association is still too new in his role. While he has been for many years a delegate from the Senate to the North Atlantic Assembly Association, on this occasion he was our distinguished chairman and a member of the standing committee.

Senator McDonald has been attending meetings of the North Atlantic Assembly for many years. He is our senior or, if I may put it this way, he is our elder. He has merited considerable respect from our colleagues from the other 14 countries, and from the standing committee on which he will do extremely well. He is looked upon with much respect, and I trust that will continue for many years to come.

While we were in Portugal we were extremely well received by our distinguished ambassador and his staff, who looked after all our needs—even taking into consideration the difficult hours at which we arrived at and left Lisbon—with the utmost delicacy. The briefing which we received from our ambassador in Lisbon was the best that it has been my good fortune to experience in the few years that I have been travelling with parliamentary groups, and I think we should manifest our heartfelt thanks to Ambassador Daniel Molgat and the Minister of External Affairs, and not hold it against the ambassador that he has a distinguished elder brother who is one of our colleagues.

I had had the opportunity prior to this to visit Portugal on a couple of occasions. It is a country that I love for many reasons. It has been my good fortune to know for many years citizens of Portugal residing in Canada, and people from that country who have become citizens of Canada. In fact, probably my first contact with and knowledge of the existence of Portugal was again in the early 1940s when there was such a serious submarine threat in the North Atlantic. On the Grand Banks off Newfoundland there was only one fleet of ships with lights on all night, lit up like Christmas trees and fishing away. It was the Portuguese white fleet.

I have been in contact from time to time with many Portuguese. Many citizens of Canada and of Newfoundland are of Portuguese origin. In St. John's, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and even in Hull there are substantial communities of citizens of Portuguese origin. They are, and will continue to be, exemplary citizens of Canada. I would like to pay that tribute to those of them who are here, and also to express my thanks and admiration to the citizens of the country itself.

Senator Yuzyk has tabled the resolutions and recommendations that were adopted by the North Atlantic Assembly. I have in years past urged that there should be at least five of us, so that we can cover all committees. On this occasion I had to jump back and forth between the Economic Committee and the Science and Technology Committee.

I shall not read the resolutions but, very broadly, one of them concerned the impact of advanced technology on ocean management. This was a Canadian initiative that has been promoted, developed, studied and presented and re-presented, as Senator McDonald said, by Mr. Ian Watson of the other place, and it is essentially the meat of the recommendations of the Science and Technology Committee. It is recommendation 68, and essentially it bears on assistance to be provided by the senior members of NATO to the southern flank nations, Turkey, Greece and Portugal, to enable their students and university people to study and acquire certain knowledge in universities in northern Europe.

A joint Atlantic strategy for economic development—I will not dwell on that because Senator McDonald has gone over it. The resolution on the maintenance of nuclear fuel supply was dealt with by two committees. I am afraid the initial draft of that resolution, which emanated mostly from the European Economic Community, was somewhat harsh in its treatment of the United States of America. We did not accept it. To some extent we took the lead in fighting it, and succeeded in attenuating its range. Much of the success of that effort, as Senator McDonald himself has said, is probably due to our leader in the Economic Committee, Mrs. Appolloni of the other house.

• (1520)

In the Science Committee, the resolution on measures to control maritime pollution has been repeated for several years. It originates with France, and in particular with Senator Lemarié of Brittany, whose area in France was the main victim of the Amoco-Cadiz disaster of a couple of years ago. We do, of course, endorse that resolution with all the power that we can muster because, as we all know, our coastline is such that we may very well be a victim of such a disaster at some time in the future.

In both the Economic and the Science and Technology Committees the question arose as to what the relations of NATO should be with China. Even though there were some vigorous proponents of the discussion of such problems, all delegations felt that any such discussion of military, economic scientific or other relations at this point in time was not within the purview of the North Atlantic Assembly, and this was put off until a future time.

Senator McDonald, as reported at page 550 of our Debates, speaking in his particular field of expertise on matters of national defence, suggested that the Senate should have a more serious look into that matter. I could not agree with him more. He and I have been discussing it mutually for months, if not years, as we have with other members of the Senate. It is my feeling that Parliament and the people of Canada do not have the information they should have of our defence commitments and our requirements at home. As for an inventory of our military establishment and our potential in defence, we do not have the perception we should have of our defence policy and planning, in either the short or the long term.

In expressing that feeling—and I think Senator McDonald will agree with me—I am not seeking in any way to start a witch hunt or to embarrass the department. All I am doing is giving expression to a real desire to help the department and give it a platform from which to tell its story and justify its priorities. With all due respect to the other place, there is more knowledge and experience of defence, and of all three services, in this chamber than exists over there, and the balance will very probably not be improved by the forthcoming general election. Time and age do indeed march on. This chamber is therefore, in my view, the most efficient venue for this type of discussion.

Senator McDonald has suggested, and Senator Grosart has not disagreed, that our rules indicate that the Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs is the place where these things should be discussed. For some time, in the committee itself and in its steering committee, I have been suggesting that because of the knowledge that resides in this house, and because of the other reasons that I have referred to previously, we should tackle the question of national defence. I am not suggesting that the committee has been reluctant to do this, but I have to say that the committee has not been diligent in doing so. Action should be taken, and taken soon, in this direction. I suggest at this point, therefore, that if these matters are to be dealt with by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate should get together and clear the way for doing so immediately we have a new Parliament.

If this is decided upon, I suggest that the selection committee at that time should keep in mind, in the formation of the committee, the members of the Senate who have experience and knowledge of all three services and who are interested in matters of defence. If that is not done immediately the new Parliament meets—and I am not threatening, since I am in no position to do so—then the initiative should be removed from the leadership for the Senate, and some of us will see to it that a motion is made for the setting up of a special committee of the Senate to look into those questions, so as to give the people and the Parliament of Canada the opportunity to look into and make known their wishes in matters of national defence.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator Forsey:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 13th February, 1979.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I am quite prepared to go ahead with this now. But I see that we barely have a quorum, and I suspect that after a very few moments of a speech by me the quorum would disappear completely. I am therefore rather inclined to suggest that this item had better stand to the next sitting. It is not a matter of any great urgency.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, March 5, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, March 5, 1979

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

THE HONOURABLE JOSEPH R. SMALLWOOD—FORMER PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to call the attention of the Senate to the presence in the visitors gallery of a distinguished Canadian in the person of the former Premier of Newfoundland, the Honourable Joseph R. Smallwood.

THE HONOURABLE E. M. CULLITON—CHIEF JUSTICE OF SASKATCHEWAN, AND MRS. CULLITON

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to distinguished visitors in the gallery in the persons of the Chief Justice of Saskatchewan, Chief Justice Culliton, and his charming wife Kay.

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN OTHER ACTS IN RESPECT OF THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEW BRUNSWICK, ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-43, to amend the Judges Act, to amend An Act to amend the Judges Act and to amend certain other Acts in respect of the reconstitution of the courts in New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Senator Flynn: Is there some real urgency, or is it the same kind of urgency that we had about the same time last year?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it may be said that good things come to those who wait.

Senator Flynn: You may have waited too long.

Senator Perrault: No one can anticipate the course of future events. All I can say about Bill C-43, which has come to us from the other place, is that it is the product of a remarkable degree of co-operation among the parties in the other place, and because of the importance to the provinces involved it was thought that the Senate should try to deal with the bill as soon as possible.

Senator Flynn: You mean emulate the House of Commons? Agreed. Later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Supplementary Estimates (B) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979.

Letter to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) from the President of Loto Canada Inc., dated March 1, 1979, regarding an omission which occurred in Appendix B of the English copy of the President's Report relating to the Loto Select project, tabled in the Senate on February 22, 1979, together with an amended copy of Appendix B.

Reports of the Administrator under the Anti-Inflation Act, pursuant to section 17(3) of the said Act, Chapter 75, Statutes of Canada, 1974-75-76, regarding the following references:

1. The Corporation of the Town of Wallaceburg, Ontario.
2. The Canadian Red Cross Society, Toronto, Ontario.

Report of the Canada Council, including its accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, pursuant to section 23 of the Canada Council Act, Chapter C-2, R.S.C., 1970.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e) moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCECOMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, March 7, 1979, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCECOMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, March 7, 1979, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to add that, although permission is sought, it is only for the purpose of having the notices of the meeting issued because the committee will sit only when the Senate rises.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 6, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to add that this motion is made in order to allow committee meetings to take place tomorrow afternoon as we have many committee meetings scheduled.

Senator Flynn: I do not see the logic of this motion and the previous one as far as Wednesday is concerned. It seems to me that we have two committees sitting on Wednesday afternoon while the Senate is sitting. Will there be more than that tomorrow afternoon?

Senator Langlois: There are at least four tomorrow and only one for Wednesday afternoon. The motion I moved in connection with Wednesday was only for the purpose of having notices issued.

Senator Flynn: What committee meetings do we have tomorrow afternoon? I know the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is meeting.

Senator Langlois: There will also be meetings of the Agriculture Committee, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, and the Retirement Age Policies Committee.

[Senator Langlois.]

Senator Flynn: The Agriculture Committee usually meets when the Senate rises. Will the Health, Welfare and Science Committee be dealing with the Health Resources Fund Act tomorrow?

Senator Langlois: No, retirement age policies.

Senator Flynn: No, that is something else. When is the committee on Health, Welfare and Science meeting to discuss Bill C-2?

Senator Langlois: Tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Senator Flynn: That does not interfere with tomorrow afternoon. There is a lack of logic and consistency when you compare the two situations; that is, Wednesday and Tuesday afternoon.

● (2010)

Senator Langlois: There is always lots of logic on this side.

Senator Flynn: I suppose I should get used to the way the government side handles matters and follow the example of the majority, simply accepting whatever is done. I may be changing sides soon, and I wonder how you will behave when you sit on this side.

Senator Argue: There aren't enough seats.

Senator Flynn: We may allow you to move to the other side. Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTUREALLEGED SALMONELLA INFECTION BY MANITOBA CATTLEFEED—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would be willing to lend his good offices to clarify a matter that is in dispute between the Minister of Agriculture in the federal government and the Minister of Agriculture in the Province of Manitoba.

Recently the federal Minister of Agriculture made a statement that salmonella bacteria had infected up to 15,000 dairy cattle in Quebec, which was traceable to an ingredient in cattlefeed manufactured in Manitoba. As one can imagine, that created a bit of a stir. I now find the Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba has informed his legislature that, in spite of double testing of feed from the province, the federal officials have found absolutely no trace of salmonella contamination in feed manufactured in Manitoba. Would the leader be kind enough to find out whether the federal Minister of Agriculture has withdrawn his statement?

Senator Perrault: That information will be obtained as soon as possible and brought to the chamber.

Senator Roblin: I should like to ask a supplementary question. If by any chance the federal minister is not willing to abandon his position, would the Leader of the Government be kind enough to furnish us with the technical documents on which his opinion is based? I ask this because the cattlefeed industry of Manitoba is quite an important one, and the members of it are very anxious that their reputation in this matter should be cleared.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I quite understand the importance of this matter to those who live in Manitoba, especially those in the cattlefeed industry. The Minister of Agriculture will be contacted for clarification and documentation if necessary.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POLICY RESPECTING HOSTILITIES BETWEEN CHINA AND VIETNAM—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to preface my question by saying that some Canadians might feel that when something happens far away it may not affect their lives. On the contrary, we have seen what has happened in Iran, and we are now feeling the repercussions as a result of the change of administration in that country.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate have any information concerning the possible cessation of hostilities between China and Vietnam?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have no current information available for tonight's sitting of the Senate. An inquiry will go forward to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENT TO PUBLISH "LABOUR GAZETTE"—QUESTION

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, some little time ago I asked the Leader of the Government a question about the suppression of the Labour Gazette, which under the act still on the statute books is supposed to be published once a month. I pointed out that the last issue had been issued in December and that the bill which is to amend the act, to remove the statutory requirement about publication, has not yet come before us. I am not sure that it has even got first reading in the other place. In view of the rumours we have had tonight and the flock of motions we have had tonight indicating urgency, and the fact that one of the pages has asked me if I want my files destroyed, I should be very grateful if the Leader of the Government could manage, if at all possible before dissolution overtakes us, to give me the answer to that question.

• (2015)

Under what warrant and by what authority was the Labour Gazette suppressed when the statutory requirement that it should be published monthly is still there on the statute books and probably now will still be there long after the election has taken place, and it will perhaps fall to the lot of the present Leader of the Opposition to introduce retroactive legislation validating this action? I do not want to make dire prophecies but—

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think it can be said it is taking an uncommonly long period of time to obtain the information which was requested by the honourable senator.

The move to cease publication of the Labour Gazette was certainly prompted in large measure by the desire of the government to save as much money as possible and to exercise restraint and economy. I think all honourable senators would welcome that general policy.

However, an inquiry will go forward immediately to determine why it has taken so long to obtain a reply.

Senator Forsey: If I may ask a supplementary, I am all in favour of saving money, but may I ask why, in the effort to save money, the law should be violated and, apparently, it is likely to be violated for a considerable length of time unless this bill is brought forward very promptly in what is probably likely to be the dying hours of the session?

I think the government ought to take note of St. Paul's injunction: "Let all things be done decently and in order."

NEWFOUNDLAND

SEAL HUNT PROTEST ACTIVITIES—PERMIT APPLICATIONS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on February 13 Senator Marshall asked for an up-to-date report of all applications for permits in relation to seal hunt protest activities in Newfoundland. Because the hunt is now under way I felt it important to bring this information to the chamber, even though all senators interested in the subject may not be here this evening.

Requests for permit applications have been received from the following groups or individuals:

1. International Fund for Animal Welfare—requested permits for Brian Davies and a veterinary pathologist, Professor Lang of Switzerland. Reason: to conduct post-mortems on seal carcasses. Negative reply to this request was signed February 19, 1979.
2. Greenpeace (Canada)—requested permits for Dr. Patrick Moore and 3 assistants. Status: Ready for decision.
3. Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals (RSPCA)—requested permission for RSPCA icebreaker to view the hunt. Status: Ready for decision.
4. Greenpeace (U.S.)—Completed forms have not yet been received.
5. Ms. Donna Bruce of Hockessin, Del., U.S. (individual) requested permit application forms. Reason: She wants to write an article for a local nature centre, and present both sides of the hunt to the public. Completed application form has not yet been returned.
6. Ms. Moira Farrow, Vancouver Express, requested application forms by telephone. They have not yet been returned.
7. Mr. Miller Ayre (CODPEACE) requested application forms. They have not yet been returned.

8. Mr. Brian A. Butters, Atlantic Correspondent, Southam News Services. Wants to present a fair picture of the hunt. Completed application form has not yet been returned.

9. Mr. Jim Winter, Fishermen's Broadcast, CBC Radio (St. John's) has requested permit application forms. They have not yet been returned.

10. Mr. Malcolm Gray, The Globe and Mail (Halifax Bureau) has not yet returned permit application forms.

11. Mr. Denis Paquin, United Press International (Halifax Bureau Newspictures Manager). Permit application form has been received. Ready for decision.

12. Mr. Don Richardson of Mr. Paul McCrossan, M.P.'s Office has requested application forms for a constituent. Completed application has not yet been returned.

● (2020)

13. Ms. Marilyn Taylor, Minneapolis Star, has requested a permit application.

14. Mr. Ken Mori, Ottawa.

15. Mr. Guy Wright, a graduate student at Memorial University doing a Master's thesis on the social organization of the Newfoundland Seal Hunt.

Senator Flynn: How many more are there?

Senator Perrault: There is just one more, unless the honourable senator would like to submit an application as well.

Senator Flynn: If you promise to come with me I will.

Senator Perrault:

16. W. Millard, Canadian Wildlife Tours, Inc. of Happy Valley, Labrador through a St. John's legal firm has requested permission to photograph and film the seal hunt.

Amendments to the Seal Protection Regulations have been announced which will prevent interference in the annual seal hunt on Canada's east coast.

Permits or licences, issued by the minister, will be required for any reason to visit the immediate area in which the hunt is being conducted.

These measures have been given unanimous approval by Parliament to prevent any disruption of the seal hunt. Accredited journalists, scientists, humane society personnel and other legitimate observers will be permitted to the hunting areas as usual. The regulations, however, prohibit persons or groups whose announced intention is to interfere with the livelihood of authorized and licenced fishermen.

Senator Molgat: I wonder whether the leader would permit a supplementary question. Could he find out for us, if he does not already have the information, which of these persons or groups have asked for permits to visit Canadian abattoirs and, in addition, if the information is available, which of those persons or groups have requested similar permits from the United States?

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that supplementary information will be sought. May I again point out that these, in most cases, are permit application forms. I shall attempt to ascertain how many have subsequently filled in the applications and are on the ice.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean the applications are on the ice?

TRADEMARK BILL, 1979

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act relating to trademarks and unfair competition".—(Honourable Senator Grosart).

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak to this order at this time. I did adjourn the debate more or less indefinitely last Wednesday for reasons that I gave then, largely because the sponsor of the bill said there was no urgency in respect of second reading at this time and there was no chance that the bill would be disposed of by Parliament before dissolution. For that reason, I adjourned the debate rather indefinitely, but if any other senator wishes to speak on second reading, I shall be pleased to yield to him.

BANKRUPTCY BILL, 1979

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill S-14, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency.

He said: Honourable senators, I hope my voice will not sound too husky this evening.

● (2025)

This bill is almost at the point of being a hardy perennial. If we look at the history of it we see that the original bill came forward in May 1975 as Bill C-60. That bill was given first reading in the House of Commons and then sat there until prorogation, at which time it died. The Senate, in the meantime, had referred the subject matter of Bill C-60 to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The committee, following a full-scale inquiry, presented a report on Bill C-60 in December 1975. There were 139 amendments, most of them substantial, proposed in the report of the committee.

In 1978 a new bill, a revised bill, was introduced in the Senate in the form of Bill S-11, which incorporated 109 of the 139 proposed amendments substantially in the form in which they were proposed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hayden: Also, there were 19 further amendments which were accepted and incorporated in part, and there were 11 which were not accepted at all. In addition, there were amendments proposed by those who appeared before the committee as witnesses. Bill S-11 suffered the same fate as Bill

C-60. It died with the prorogation of the last session of Parliament.

We now have another bill, Bill S-14. Of the 420 clauses in Bill S-11, 268 are carried through in Bill S-14 without change, and there are 128 of the clauses of Bill S-11 in respect of which some changes have been made. A number of the amendments proposed originally by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee in relation to Bill C-60 have survived through the series of bills that have come forward and are still in their feature position in Bill S-14.

As I pointed out in moving the second reading of Bill S-11 in April 1978, honourable senators will again find a number of clauses in this bill printed in italics. The numbers have changed in this bill as compared to Bill S-11, so perhaps for purposes of the record I should indicate them again. First, clause 11 has to do with the appointment of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy. The purpose of printing in italics, of course, is, as I explained last time, to earmark clauses which are not within the competence of the Senate to pass because they deal with the appropriation of money. Inherent in the appointment of a Superintendent of Bankruptcy, of course, is the provision for payment of his salary and the maintenance of the office.

Then there is clause 18(4) which occurs on page 17 of Bill S-14. It provides for the superintendent to make inquiries and examinations in the course of his work of administration. Clauses 57 and 59 on pages 37 and 38 deal with the Bankruptcy Indemnity Account, while clause 56 on page 37 deals with the Bankruptcy Trust Account, and those are all in italics. In committee, as, when and if this bill is referred to committee, which I would expect it to be, these clauses will be struck out, but they will be labelled in such a way that they will be readily recognizable when the bill gets to the other place. That is the purpose of doing it in this form, although sometimes the form has been to print them in red. I think I gave you a treatise last time for which Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) was responsible some years ago when he was Government Leader in the Senate, so if you want to refresh your memory on that you may look at the Senate Hansard of April 4, 1978.

Then, honourable senators, I should point out to you what I think I could describe as the most important amendment proposed by your committee to Bill C-60. That bill proposes that a wage-earner be given priority over secured creditors for arrears of wages up to $2,000. In our committee, after hearing evidence, we concluded that this was not a way in which any particular benefit could be given to the wage-earner, because the language of the clause did not give any assurance of promptness of payment, which is most important as far as wage-earners are concerned. The wage-earner has a way of life in which his current income must be available to meet his current expenses on a weekly basis, and this provision in the bill gave no assurance of that, because the trustee of a bankrupt estate, I think it is a fair assumption, would have no particular money on hand for the purpose of paying claims of this kind. He would have to borrow it and in seeking around to borrow it, with the wage claims enjoying a priority, there would be difficulties and, understandably, it would be more expensive. Then looking at it from a general point of view, labour-intensive industries would present a great problem for the trustee in trying to raise money in order to meet these obligations. Your committee felt that there was a simpler and more direct way, and while we recommended that the priority of wage-earners' claims over those of secured creditors be deleted, we also recommended that an insurance fund be established, such fund to be contributed to by either the employer or the employer and employee.

For instance, with respect to the Workmen's Compensation Board, the contributions are by the employer. But we had evidence before us which showed that the cost of financing that insurance fund would be low. The departmental officers made an estimate that with a work force in Canada of nine million persons, and each one contributing ten cents per week, a fund of over $40 million would be produced in one year. On their best estimate—and it was just an estimate—they concluded that if the arrears of wages in bankruptcy ever amounted to even as much as $4 million it would be an extraordinary situation.

Then we had evidence, too, to show that in France they have this insurance system working, and working most satisfactorily. But it operates, so our evidence indicated, in a more expensive way, and it costs more to administer. In Germany they have this insurance fund system. In England they have installed this insurance fund system, and I understand that the contributions there are made by the employer. We recommend this because there is no question about the promptness of payment. The fund is there. This is the need of the wage earner.

It is remarkable that the Toronto Star had an editorial on this in its Saturday paper. The article is entitled, "Make Sure Employees Get Paid." The article says:

It's unjust that in a bankruptcy the company's employees lose all or some of the pay still coming to them.

This often happens because secured creditors of a bankrupt business—such as banks and mortgage companies who have collateral for the loans they've made—get first claim on whatever money is left in a bankrupt business.

Employees may get only a portion of their wages or none at all.

As part of a new Bankruptcy Act now before the Senate, the federal government is considering an insurance scheme to protect the wages and fringe benefits of workers whose employers go under.

That statement is not quite accurate because Bill S-14 does not contain the recommendation we made about establishing an insurance fund. It does provide that the wage earners shall be preferred creditors, which means that they would come after secured creditors and after the trustee's reimbursement.

In that connection, Bill S-14 also provides several additional amounts of money which the wage earner would get, I think up to $500 in connection with pensions and health schemes and welfare benefits, and reimbursement to salesmen and others up to $600 in connection with disbursements they would make in carrying out their work.

The minister did make a statement at the time indicating that they are still studying this insurance plan. The only comment I would make at this time is that when we made our report on Bill C-60 in 1975, and recommended that an insurance plan or fund be established, the department started to study the question then. They have had three and a half years in which to study the question. Perhaps it is a complicated subject, and perhaps it takes a little longer to determine who is going to bear the cost. I should think that the simplest phase of the consideration of the insurance fund would be who was going to pay the cost, because the cost would be relatively negligible, and any person who thinks rationally would feel satisfied if he had to pay five cents, or even ten cents, a week in order to be assured, in the event of bankruptcy, that whatever his arrears might be, he would get paid promptly—and the emphasis is on the word “promptly.”

● (2040)

Perhaps I may be allowed to digress for a moment. Recently I was interviewed by a CBC official in connection with a program called Ombudsman. I was told that he wanted to talk to me about the priority of wage earners accorded in Bill C-60, which was not proceeded with, and he wanted to learn my attitude and views in connection with that.

Having the subject fairly clearly in my mind, I agreed to be interviewed. The interview turned out to be an eye-opener for me. When I saw the program on the evening it was televised, there were some initial remarks made by the gentleman concerned—remarks that were made somewhere at some time, but not on any occasion when I was present—in which he said that the Senate had killed the bill.

Now, how the Senate could kill something that never got to the Senate is beyond me, but that was his statement. There was another expedient used, in which he asked questions which contained certain inferences and then I, as the interviewee, was faded out and no answer to the question was televised. That enabled him to put forward some propaganda, because he supported the theory that priority had to be accorded to wage earners, that they were entitled to their money ahead of secured creditors.

So I said to him—I am not sure whether or not it got through to him—“Well, what will the trustee use for money? Let us assume that the company is bankrupt, that it does not have money, and it has to find money. If it is a radio plant, would the employees settle for radios, or for vacuum cleaners, because those would be the only items the trustee would have, and such items might be subject to a chattel mortgage, or a conditional sale agreement?”

That program taught me a lesson. I would only agree to another interview subject to certain limitations or qualifications—namely, if I myself could man the equipment, or have it manned by people on whom I could count.

Senator Walker: Such as the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

[Senator Hayden.]

Senator Hayden: Continuing the Star editorial, it says:

A more direct method would be to give workers who are owed wages priority over all other creditors. This was proposed in a bill that died on the order paper in 1975. It hasn't been revived in the new bill because of objections that it would make it both more difficult and more costly for business to borrow money.

If so, an insurance scheme may be a good alternative.

Please note this line:

And as the Canadian Labor Congress noted in a brief to the Senate when it was debating the 1975 bill, an insurance plan would enable workers to get their money more quickly than giving them priority over unsecured creditors.

The editorial goes on to discuss the question of cost, and to deal with it in the writer's own inimitable way.

There is likely to be a great deal of interest shown in connection with this question, and I am glad to see that the government has displayed courage regarding the matter. When the bill was introduced in the Senate, the minister was interviewed and he said that the government had not forgotten the insurance plan which had been put forward by the Senate, that it was studying the question of costs and how they were to be allocated. At some stage we may still get to it. What will be the committee's or the Senate's position when we get to it? Your conclusion, honourable senators, is as good as my own at the present moment.

It would be merely repetitive for me to indicate some of the other important items that were recommended in the original Senate committee report, which I dealt with in April 1978, when we were dealing with Bill S-11 at second reading stage. One aspect was that an international problem arises in bankruptcy matters where the bankruptcy occurs in Canada but some of the operations and assets are located in the United States. Courts in the United States have refused to recognize the trustee, in connection with the estate, because he had not been appointed by the courts.

That aspect is effectively dealt with in Bill S-14. In clause 313 of the bill, at pages 204 and 205, honourable senators will find auxiliary and supplementary provisions dealing with various situations that might arise in that connection. I would draw their attention also to clauses 314 to 317, at pages 206 to 209. I have mentioned the page numbers because, as honourable senators can see, the bill is quite substantial and it is difficult to go through it to find particular clauses if the index is not sufficiently informative. While a fair job of indexing has been done, it is not as handy as if one were able to turn directly to the page required.

I should mention also that there is provision in Bill S-14 in connection with the liability of directors for wages. That marks a change. First, it provides that liability is governed and determined within the limits and scope of the bankruptcy legislation itself. In other words, any provision in the Canada Business Corporations Act cannot be invoked; and any provision in the Business Corporations Act of Ontario or any other province which may emphasize the liability of directors is superseded by the provision contained in the Bankruptcy Bill, S-14, and it alone governs the question of directors' liability.

● (2050)

The interesting thing about directors' liability is this. If you look at subclause 188(3), you will see that it says:

A director or former director is not liable under subsection (1)—

Subsection (1) is the subsection that makes him liable.

—if he relies in good faith on

(a) financial statements of the corporation represented to him by an officer of the corporation or in a written report of the auditor of the corporation fairly to reflect the financial condition of the corporation; or

(b) a report of a lawyer, accountant, engineer, appraiser or other person whose profession lends credibility to a statement made by him.

These provisions, where the director escapes this liability for the wages, in the circumstances where he relies in good faith on these exceptions, is new, and is brought into force by the provisions of clause 188. There is no such provision in the Ontario Business Corporations Act, and I would suspect that there perhaps is not one in the corporate statutes of other provinces either, since the qualifications in the Canada Business Corporations Act do not go as far as this legislation proposes to go.

Senator Flynn was a faithful attender at our meetings and was quite a contributor to the study, as a result of which two new features were incorporated in the bill, one of which consisted of efforts to avoid having to carry proceedings through into bankruptcy and to the bankruptcy legislation, and the other was the introduction of what are called consumer and commercial arrangements. These are under Part II and Part IV of this bill, as an alternative to bankruptcy. Under this method a debtor could make a proposal to his creditors, and if the necessary percentage of creditors accepted either 100 per cent liquidation of debts over three years, or a lesser percentage acceptable to the creditors, then the proceedings could go forward if they were within the limits prescribed for consumer arrangements, or, if they were on the corporate side, for commercial arrangements. In addition you have an express delegation to the provinces of the administration of consumer arrangements in bankruptcy so as to make use of local counseling and services. That is to be found in clause 16, on page 16 of the bill.

There are many other features, some of which, I think, would be regarded as important. On the other hand, you may wonder why there is such a large number of clauses that remain unchanged, and I would say, if I might use the expression, that these really bear on the guts of the operation of the bill, and are in a form that presents neither problems nor confusion. Some of the changes in this bill, as opposed to Bill S-11, have been made in the interests not of policy as such, but rather with the object of polishing the bill a bit, and making the language perhaps a little more readable and understandable. In statute law it is very important to get all the help possible to ascertain the intent of the law from the language. When the language causes confusion, this simply means that the courts have more work to do.

There is nothing more I can usefully contribute at this time. I could develop other aspects of the bill, but it will be studied in depth in committee. I can tell you that the committee's experts were consulted, and they consulted the chairman, when the study was being made by the departmental officers of Bill S-11 in the preparation of Bill S-14. And this shows. I am sure you will have less criticism of this bill than you have had of many others you have been exposed to. I think this is the preferred way of doing things if the legislation we are dealing with is the kind that we can give the necessary public exposure to. Of course, there are difficulties in the way of doing that. Tax bills, to some extent, are examples. I, for one, think we would have better tax bills if there were more consultation with the public interest in some fashion with regard to them. It is not my job at the moment to suggest in what way that could be done, but where there is less than full input in the preparation of legislation there is a tremendous amount of extra output when we start to look at it, and perhaps a lot of time is taken up in doing that that could usefully be devoted somewhere else.

That ends the story of the latest in the field of bankruptcy and insolvency bills, with no assurance that this is the last time that you will see a bill dealing with bankruptcy and insolvency, in light of present circumstances, and in view of the uncertainty of a reasonable amount of time being available for the study of this bill in depth.

Senator Flynn: In view of the last remarks of the sponsor of the bill, I do not think I should worry about adjourning the debate.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could put a couple of questions to Senator Hayden.

I believe Senator Hayden quoted from an editorial in which it was alleged that if wage earners were to be secured creditors the cost of borrowing would increase. Is it not equally true to say that if that were the case lending institutions would monitor those companies a little more closely, and clip their wings a little, and perhaps thus avoid a possible bankruptcy.

● (2100)

My second question concerns the assumption that if the proposed insurance scheme—which is not mentioned in this bill—were put into effect, the cost of it would be negligible. Having arrived at such an assumption, has a study been made to determine what the cost would be?

Senator Hayden: The first question my friend asked deals with what I shall call the "sophisticated lender." The moment you assume a lender is sophisticated, you must assume that he is concerned where his money is and how well it is being treated, and he will study and monitor the operations in a nice way. If his security appears to be endangered, he will take action under the security. However, that is not the point at which the problem starts. The problem starts when there is a bankruptcy. The die has been cast; the man or the corporation has become insolvent, and has become insolvent because he or it cannot meet his or its debts as they fall due. In these circumstances it is a fair assumption that the corporation or the individual does not have the necessary money in order to pay unsecured claims.

Let us assume that priority to wage-earners becomes law. What would happen in those circumstances? What would happen if the trustee went around trying to borrow the money? Based on my experience—which over a lifetime of practice of law has been reasonably extensive—I would say the trustee would have a very difficult and costly time trying to raise money. The lawyer would be asked to advise as to what security is being offered to the lender. What can the lawyer say when the wage-earner is sitting with a priority for his wages over the secured debts that are presently there? The kind of security the trustee could give would have to be assessed. If it is a gold mine, perhaps he could offer some of the gold in the ground.

As I said to this interviewer, you could use merchandise as your protection, but the wage-earner does not want that. My own view is that he should not have to look to that—there should be a vehicle provided that will assure him of prompt payment that fits into his current way of living and current income by way of wages or salary. That can be done very inexpensively, and a lot of countries are doing it.

I have belaboured this question a little bit, but this matter seems to be springing into prominence, and a lot of people solve the problem quickly by saying, "Give the wage-earner priority". You are not giving him any assurance that he is going to be paid promptly, and a trustee cannot give that assurance because he has to go out and find the money. The wage-earner gets his security, and it develops into a long-term obligation. Perhaps at some time in the future the money will appear. The wage-earner, with his priority ahead of the secured creditors, ends up waiting a long time, and perhaps forever, for his money.

What did your other question relate to?

Senator Bosa: It was alleged that the cost of this insurance would be negligible. Have any studies been made to estimate the amount of claims that would arise in order to arrive at the conclusion that the cost would be negligible?

Senator Hayden: Studies have been going on since we made our report in December 1975. The minister made a statement when he brought forward this bill in which he said that the department was studying this, and that they had people studying the operations of those plans in France, Germany and the United Kingdom. The plan in France, of course, is very expensive because it includes factors like severance pay on termination of employment, vacation pay, and those other extras which add to the cost. However, the ten cents which I told you about a short time ago included only what we recommended—that is, that it be only the actual arrears in wages. It did not include severance pay and vacation pay; just what the wage-earner is actually out-of-pocket, and he should get that money immediately. An insurance plan is the best way of doing it.

Senator Langlois: Exclusive of fringe benefits.

Senator Bosa: I do not wish to appear to take issue with the honourable senator, but in the absence of such an insurance scheme at this time does he not think that the wage-earner might be better off with having some degree of security for his wages if he were put in the preferred secured class of creditor rather than having no security at all?

Senator Hayden: My friend must have noticed that the National Labour Council said that the insurance plan assured prompt payment which the priority of the wage earner over the secured creditor did not assure. I read that from the editorial in the Toronto Star. The National Labour Council submitted a brief to the Senate committee in 1975 when we were studying the original bill.

Senator Forsey: Might I ask the honourable senator a question? When he says the "National Labour Council", does he mean the Canadian Labour Congress? There used to be something called the "National Labour Council" which was a complete fake, and I think the quotation he gave referred to the Canadian Labour Congress.

Senator Hayden: It is a different council.

On motion of Senator Flynn debate adjourned.

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN OTHER ACTS IN RESPECT OF THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEW BRUNSWICK, ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill C-43, to amend the Judges Act, to amend an act to amend the Judges Act and to amend certain other acts in respect of the reconstitution of the courts in New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan.

He said: Honourable senators, you have before you Bill C-43, which is a bill with a long title. Its short title is "An Act to amend the Judges Act and certain other Acts". It has two purposes: the first is to give effect to the restructuring of the court system in New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan. New Brunswick and Alberta have already passed the necessary legislation, and Saskatchewan is planning to do so during the spring session there. The purpose, of course, is to merge what were formerly the district courts with the trial division of the supreme courts, as many of us would know them, to form courts of Queen's Bench. That is not a new procedure in Canada. The Province of Quebec has had one superior court since Confederation; the Province of Prince Edward Island merged its courts some time ago. That course is open to any of the provinces. It is entirely within their jurisdiction to decide upon the structures that they want for their courts. They have decided that they wish to do this in these particular provinces, and the first purpose of this bill is to facilitate the restructuring of the courts in those provinces.

The second purpose of the bill is to renew the pool of judicial salaries. Honourable senators will recall that for many years each time one of the provinces wanted additional judges for one of their courts it was necessary for us to amend the Judges Act to give them that additional establishment. That was getting most difficult, because they were having to wait for long periods to get the necessary legislation through the Parliament of Canada. So in 1973 there was an amendment to the Judges Act to create a pool of judicial salaries that would allow the salaries to be available when the provincial legislatures determined that additional judges were needed in the various categories of courts.

What happens now is that because 17 of the judges whose salaries are provided for in the pool created earlier have indeed been appointed, it is now necessary to refresh that pool with additional salaries to bring it back up to the 34 appointments that are permitted before there has to be action by the Parliament of Canada.

There is one additional aspect to the pool, and that is that we are now suggesting that there be an addition of 15 judges for unified family courts. There are already in place unified family courts in Ontario, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland, but this would appear to be just the beginning of a trend in the provinces, so there is provision for a pool of 15 salaries for the appointment of unified family court judges also in the future.

Those are the two purposes of the bill. Perhaps I could leave it at that, unless there are questions. The purposes are straightforward, in the sense that they allow the provinces who have indicated their wish to do so to restructure their courts, and it also simply refreshes the pool of judicial salaries to allow the courts to continue asking for appointments and having the appointments made in accordance with the will of the Parliament of Canada, but without the delays that were customary some years ago.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the two purposes of the bill have been well explained by the sponsor, Senator Stanbury. The problem is rather technical. This text was, I think, preceded by another one, which was somewhat different, and I have some difficulty in finding out exactly what was first proposed and what was finally adopted by the House of Commons. For instance, the sponsor did not mention that there was any increase in the number of judges of the Court of Appeal of Quebec, and it seems to me that there was at least one proposal to add one judge to that court. I don't know about the other provinces. I cannot find it here. In any event, to expedite matters, I think we could give second reading to this bill tonight, because it is not controversial at all, and have the bill examined in committee tomorrow morning, if that is possible, if the sponsor is agreeable to that.

Senator Perrault: We will do our best to accommodate you.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, as long as the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs can handle it tomorrow, I think that is probably the right way to deal with the matter.

A short answer to the honourable senator's question, however, is that initially I think it was not clear that the numbers that show up as an increase are not really an increase in the number of judges. What it does is provide for the fact that the county or district court judges now become supreme court judges or judges of the superior courts.

Senator Flynn: In some of the provinces.

Senator Stanbury: One item which I did not mention before, which I think perhaps was involved in one of the earlier drafts, is the matter of salaries. This bill does not involve any increase in salaries. I think at one time there may have been some suggestion that it would involve some increase in salaries, but this bill does not increase salaries, except for the county court judges or district judges who are now attaining the status of superior court judges.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Stanbury moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave, I should like to inform the Senate that arrangements have already been made for the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to consider this bill at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning in room 260-N, the reading room.

Senator Flynn: Arrangements have already been made. Very good!

Senator Langlois: They were made as you were speaking.

Senator Molgat: Just to respect your wishes.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 13, 1979:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 13th February, 1979.

He said: Honourable senators, this may be the last chance I shall have to deal with this inquiry. It may also be the last chance I shall have to address any remarks on any subject to the Senate, so I should like to preface my remarks on the inquiry by saying that I feel very sorry that I shall shortly be separated from the many friends whom I flatter myself I have made in the Senate, my colleagues who have "been to my virtues very kind, been to my faults a little blind," and who have showered upon me with immeasurable generosity, numberless kindnesses far beyond my deserts. I should like to add also that I hope that in some measure I have earned my keep while I was here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Forsey: This particular fourth report is a rather interesting one, because it is very different from any that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has submitted before. It calls attention really to what one might describe as a yawning gap, an abyss, a chasm, or alternatively as a cat's cradle of particularities.

• (2120)

I can summarize very briefly what the substance of the report is. For general commercial purposes, an importer of:

"Men's and Boys', Women's and Girls', Children's and Infants' footwear other than rubber, canvas or waterproof plastic footwear and other than downhill ski boots . . ."

for general commercial purposes, an importer must rely on an individual permit from the minister and the granting of a permit lies entirely in the minister's discretion.

There are no ascertainable instruments or legal rules involved, and the committee feels that if import controls have become a feature of Canadian economic management there should be a set of rules more elaborate than those set out in a short statute and a skeletal set of regulations that will enable importers and retailers of goods to know what they face and can enforce what procedure they must follow and expect to be followed.

Now, honourable senators may think this is a trivial matter. It is not. Four or five years ago the number of permits involved was about 12,000. In particular, apparently, in the benign and salubrious and gentle climate of British Columbia, these permits have proliferated with a tropical luxuriance and the figure in 1977 I think it is, or 1978—the last figure we have—shows that the number has grown in these very few years from 12,000 to some 250,000 individual permits, and, apparently, from what one member of the committee very specially concerned with this problem has told us, importers are left in complete darkness as to whether they will get their permit or whether they won't, why they will get it or why they won't, and I even gather the impression that to some extent there was a certain amount of wangling going on about these permits.

Anyway, the situation seems to be extraordinarily curious and it seems very peculiar that transactions on this scale should depend entirely on the discretion of the minister or, in practice, I have no doubt, on the discretion of some of his officials. I can't imagine that the minister himself goes over every one of these 250,000 cases and says—well, more; these are only the permits that are granted—and says, "This one yes. That one no. This one yes. That one no." The opportunities for favouritism on the part of officials, the opportunities for partisan manipulation, are obviously very great. The situation has got to a point where the officials in the department themselves are rather alarmed by this lush jungle of permits and would be really rather grateful if the committee's report on the subject should lead to some legislation which would mean genuine regulation—proper, legal regulation of this whole situation.

I don't think there is very much more I need say about it. Honourable senators will observe that my swan song has been for once a relatively brief effort. I am sure they will be grateful for this. I have been, I know, far too loquacious during my time here, but I think that the situation really cries out—the situation revealed in this report really cries out for some kind of system, some kind of real policy, some kind of legal rules so that when importers of footwear want to get a permit to import they should know where to go and how to get it and not simply be left in the position of supplicants, mendicants going to the minister or some official and not having the faintest notion why they are going to get the permit or why they are not going to get it and what will happen to them if they don't get it, though in a good many cases what happens to them is that they go bankrupt, if I am correctly informed. The matter is a very serious matter to a large number of people, apparently, particularly on the Pacific coast and that is why I thought it was highly necessary to draw this matter to the attention of the Senate. I hope it has already been drawn by someone else in the other place to the attention of that august body.

I suppose now this is the end of the thing. It is possible that when the new Parliament meets somebody may do something about it. It is possible that, as I said the other day, we may have a somewhat rejuvenated government of the present party in office. We may have a new government. We may have a government of one party or the other which is dependent for a third or fourth party for its existence. And perhaps some of these things to which the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has drawn attention may be remedied. I sincerely hope so, but by that time I shall be the most private of private citizens and barely an obscure memory in this chamber and in the public generally.

Senator Thompson: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I did not catch what categories there were. Did you say footwear? Did you include imports of knit wear?

Senator Forsey: I will quote you the exact terms:

"Men's and Boys', Women's and Girls', Children's and Infants' footwear other than rubber, canvas or waterproof plastic footwear and other than downhill ski boots . . ."

I should have added when I was quoting before:

"... whether fully or partially manufactured."

I suppose that infants' footwear might include knitted booties or something of that kind. I can't say. In general I think it is what we ordinarily think of as footwear, though not downhill ski boots. If you are buying ski boots of the kind that I would get to do cross-country skiing, apparently that is outside the purview of this altogether. But it appears to cover in general what we ordinarily think of as footwear. It does not cover running shoes or rubbers or galoshes but it appears to cover most of what we ordinarily think of as footwear.

I think it would cover plastic footwear and imitation leather footwear, I don't know; possibly some of those curious papier-mâché boots that were supplied to the troops in the First World War. But I presume those are no longer being manufactured.

Senator Thompson: Is there any rationale for singling out footwear or does the same approach apply to coats, to men's pants and to a number of other areas? Why footwear?

Senator Forsey: I don't know. This appears to be the only matter that has been drawn to our attention, and this perhaps is simply that the other commodities have not come within the searchlight of the attention of Mrs. Simma Holt, who is a member of our committee, a very energetic member of the committee and who is really on fire about the kind of thing that has gone on on the Pacific coast in connection with this footwear business.

Judging by what she has told us—which nobody has seriously challenged, I might add—it is really a very serious matter for a large number of businesses there—and small businesses in most cases. Whether the same thing applies to some other articles of clothing, I couldn't say. It is quite possible that it does. But we have not had it drawn to our attention and we might not have had this drawn to our attention if it had not burned Mrs. Holt up.

● (2130)

Senator Bosa: Does the honourable senator know if this is a temporary measure awaiting the result of the GATT negotiations?

Senator Forsey: It has been there since 1974 or 1975, at least. No, I do not think it is a temporary measure at all. The new regulations under which this particular instrument which we are dealing with were a revision of the Import Payment Regulations of 1954. So I do not think it can have any appreciable connection with the GATT negotiations. There have been, perhaps, a series of GATT negotiations in the last 25 years, but this is something that, apparently, has been there for a very long time and I do not think it is a provisional or temporary thing at all. But apparently it has just gone on. It has grown like Topsy, and now even the officials are getting frightened.

Senator Walker: I hate to think that my distinguished friend is closing his career in this august body talking about children's footwear and mundane matters of that kind. If this is to be a swan song, will he give us a word of advice before he leaves and tell us what his impressions are on this place and what his plans are for the future. Of all the distinguished people we have had in recent years, there is no question that Senator Forsey is one of the most distinguished.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Walker: I cannot help but look back on the enormous aid that he was to us all in fighting that iniquitous bill, Bill C-60. That showed the measure of the man and showed his independence and scholarliness. I hope he will have a chance before he does leave—and it will have to be before Friday—to give us somewhat of a swan song.

Senator Riley: I have heard a lot of projections on elections, but my understanding is that only one man can call an election, and the one who has mentioned next Friday is a former Prime Minister of Canada.

I am looking forward to Senator Forsey, with all his red ribbons, introducing another report to the Senate, and I hope that he has not been dragged into the conjecture that is being made on an election being called next Friday. I would think that no matter at what date he reaches age 75, he would be entitled to stay here until the dissolution of Parliament. I think he realizes that, and I am looking forward to Senator Forsey, not only presenting another report from the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, but to giving us a forceful speech about his career in the Senate.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted to say a word in response to the very generous remarks from my two colleagues, a proof of what I said about the generosity and magnanimity of my colleagues, I would like to say two other things. One is that I am glad to be leaving before the signs of mental decay become as obvious to everybody as they are to me. The other is that, as far as my plans are concerned, the best thing for anybody to say in reply to that when one reaches my age is to quote the old Irishman who said, "There's people dying now that never died before."

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Langlois tabled:

Report of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce under Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (Part I, Corporations) for the fiscal periods ended in 1976, pursuant to section 18(1) of the said Act, Chapter C-31, R.S.C., 1970.

JUDGES ACT AND CERTAIN OTHER ACTS IN RESPECT OF THE SUPREME COURTS OF NEW BRUNSWICK, ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Langlois, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 6, 1979

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill C-43, intituled: "An Act to amend the Judges Act, to amend An Act to amend the Judges Act and to amend certain other Acts in respect of the reconstitution of the courts in New Brunswick, Alberta and Saskatchewan," has in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, March 5, 1979, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

Léopold Langlois,
Deputy Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Stanbury, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Bonnell, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, presented the following report:

Tuesday, March 6, 1979.

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to which was referred Bill C-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the Health Resources Fund Act", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, February 28, 1979, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Your committee, however, is concerned about the effect Bill C-2 would have on certain projects that were in progress on November 4, 1978. This is the date set out in the Bill after which the Minister would no longer be able to authorize payments under the Health Resources Fund Act to the government of a province in respect of a health training facility as defined in that Act.

Your committee is concerned that these projects will not qualify for assistance under the Act merely because the particular applications in respect of these projects were not received by the Minister prior to November 4, 1978.

Your committee, therefore, recommends that the Government consider alternative methods of providing financial assistance in respect of any such project that, but for the cut-off date set out in the bill, would have qualified for a contribution under the Act.

Respectfully submitted,

M. Lorne Bonnell,
Chairman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean that third reading will be tomorrow?

Senator Frith: I thought that was what was asked.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but the problem is in respect to the recommendation. Does the sponsor of the bill wish us to say something about the recommendation of the committee? This is very important because, as I listened to the report, there seemed to me to be something bothering the committee concerning the facts surrounding this bill. I think the question now arises whether this report and the recommendation it contains should not be adopted by the Senate and sent on to the House of Commons. Would not the sponsor of the bill prefer to have this question considered tonight rather than tomorrow?

Senator Frith: I feel, honourable senators, that either would be suitable. My inclination is to think that any debate or comment on the recommendation would be more useful tonight. That will then leave us clear to debate the bill on third reading on the basis of contributions made to the record tonight.

Senator Grosart: Is the honourable sponsor of the bill suggesting that the report be taken into consideration?

Senator Frith: Tonight, yes.

Senator Grosart: You are asking for leave that it be taken into consideration tonight; is that correct?

Senator Frith: If necessary.

Senator Grosart: I am just wondering if the sponsor of the bill is familiar with our rules and particularly rule 78 which governs this situation and which requires that a report which requires implementation can only be taken into consideration on a day's notice. We are not arguing that point. I just want to be quite clear as to what is before us. If the honourable senator is now asking leave for the report be taken into consideration, then we know exactly where we are.

Senator Frith: I am not familiar with the rule. The question raised by the Leader of the Opposition was whether I thought it would be more advantageous to discuss the report, and particularly the recommendation that is part of the report, tonight rather than tomorrow, and prior to third reading. If I had known about the rule I would have assumed I would be granted leave. If technically I have to ask for leave in order to agree with the Leader of the Opposition's suggestion that we discuss the recommendation, then I consider it so asked for. Whatever is necessary to follow that suggestion I think we should do.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to quote rule 78(2) which states:

A report presented to the Senate shall be received without debate.

Senator Roblin: Read rule 78(5).

Senator Bonnell: Rule 78(5) states:

When the report recommends amendments to a bill or makes proposals which require legislative implementation by the Senate, a motion to adopt the report shall be in order: Provided that where the recommended amendments or proposals which require legislative implementation are substantial, consideration of the report shall be postponed to a future day.

I do not believe that in this case we are asking for any legislative implementation. Therefore, I believe by our rules we are not entitled to debate this motion when there is no amendment made to the bill.

Senator Roblin: I am wondering what rule book my honourable friend is reading from.

Senator Grosart: It is a bit out of date.

● (2010)

Senator Roblin: One of us is mistaken here. I am looking at the Rules of the Senate of Canada, amended as of October 18, 1977, in which rule 78(5) is quite different. My version says:

When the report recommends amendments to a bill, or makes proposals that require implementation by the Senate, consideration of the report shall not be moved unless notice has been given pursuant to rule 44(1)(e) or 45(1)(f), as the case may be.

On the point of order I suppose we should be asking ourselves whether the report requires implementation by the Senate, which seems to be the operative passage of rule 78(5).

I only listened to the report as read by the Clerk, so I cannot be entirely sure. It seems to me that it does require implementation if we are being asked to approve the special recommendation that will be made to the other place with respect to this bill. That would be my impression, although naturally I would be happy to listen to members of the Senate who are more familiar with the rules than I am.

Senator McIlraith: I wonder if I might say something about the rules?

Senator Flynn: Why not? Why do you wonder?

Senator Walker: He is an expert.

Senator McIlraith: The rule is that when a committee report is presented that does not propose amendments to the bill, nothing further need be done with it.

Senator Flynn: Oh!

Senator McIlraith: Just hear me out. If the Leader of the Opposition would be patient it would be helpful in arriving at a correct solution to some of these problems that arise in the Senate. If the report does not recommend amendments to the bill, then no further steps with regard to it need be taken other than presenting it. If it is wished to consider the matters recommended in the report that do not involve amendments to the bill, there are two methods of proceeding. One is to move for concurrence in the report. The other is to move under the latter part of rule 78(3), which says:

—but may on motion be placed on the orders of the day for future consideration.

There are the two methods.

As I understand the report—and here I ask the indulgence of the Senate, because I only heard it read and have no knowledge of it other than hearing it read quickly here—it does not propose any amendments to the bill. Therefore, there is no need for any action whatever to be taken with respect to it, although the contents of the report would be debatable on the motion for third reading. The report having made recommendations rather than proposing amendments to the bill, there are two other possible motions that can also be made with respect to the report. That is the way I understand the rule. I think that is the problem before the Senate now.

Senator Grosart: On the point of order. I am quite sure the honourable senator is utterly confused, because he has apparently not read rule 78(5) very carefully.

Senator McIlraith: Yes, I have.

Senator Grosart: I will not argue. He kept saying that unless there is an amendment, the earlier rules apply. The important passage is "makes proposals that require implementation," and I would suggest the implementation by the Senate that is required at this time is concurrence in the report. However, I do not think that is of any particular importance at this time. The sponsor of the bill, Senator Frith, has made it quite clear that he is prepared to ask for leave, and it is just a question of whether leave is granted.

There are very good reasons, I may say, on the point of order, why some of us, not only on this side, feel that there should be time to give further consideration to this report because there is information that has been given to some of us that the Government of British Columbia was completely dissatisfied with the attitude taken by the Government of Canada, and continues to be dissatisfied with the refusal of this committee to accede to its request to be heard. It is for that reason that I, for one, suggest that we have some time to consider this. I, for one, would like to read the committee proceedings, because I am speaking now only from hearsay. If the sponsor of the bill is asking for leave, I am quite prepared that it be granted, but on the condition that we have the opportunity to discuss the report tomorrow.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, it seems to me that we are asking Madam Speaker to perform a difficult task. The suggestion to consider the report on this bill this evening came from the Leader of the Opposition, and now opposition to that comes from that side of the house. We cannot ask Madam Speaker to put some accord in the ranks of the opposition.

Senator Flynn: We on this side do not have the cement-like cohesiveness that power provides.

Senator Langlois: You yourself suggested that we consider this report this evening, and now objection to that is coming from your own party.

Senator Grosart: No, not at all. I said I was quite prepared to have it considered tonight.

Senator Langlois: Yes, after you raised the point of order.

Senator Grosart: Of course. Surely the honourable senator realizes there is a great difference between rising on a point of order and then expressing one's views as to what should be done with respect to a particular bill. They are two quite different things.

I said I was not pressing the point of order, but it is well to have it on the record so that in future, should we be faced with a similar situation, we would know the meaning of the phrase "makes proposals that require implementation by the Senate." To my mind it is important that that be interpreted so that we know, in the event that we have a similar recommendation in the future, whether the Senate has the right to insist on consideration of the report. I am not pressing the point now, but there will come a time when it will be important that we know what that part of rule 78(5) means.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the two matters raised on the point of order were discussed at some length in the committee, and it seems I left the committee with a misunderstanding. I understood that the Leader of the Opposition at the committee hearing was concerned about the matters raised by his colleague Senator Grosart and that it was those concerns that led to the recommendation that was added to the report. As honourable senators will note, the bill was carried in its entirety.

I understand, also, there may be more than an academic interest in getting an interpretation of what "implementation by the Senate" means. I had thought that the deliberations of the committee led to the conclusion that the bill should be adopted without amendment, but that a recommendation be made to the minister, which recommendation was to be communicated to the minister by the chairman of the committee. That was my impression. It may be a wrong one, but that was my impression.

If that impression were correct, then implementation of the recommendation is not required by the Senate. That, of course, is something that can be the subject of a ruling. In any event, if we are going to have to ask for leave to discuss the recommendation this evening with the condition that we also discuss the recommendation tomorrow, then it seems to me a good deal of the advantage in what I understood to be Senator Flynn's suggestion is lost.

I am in the hands of both sides of the house on this. Perhaps we should just follow the rules strictly and give notice and do the whole job tomorrow. I am game to do it in whatever way we want to do it, in order to expedite consideration of the committee's report and third reading of the bill.

● (2020)

[Translation]

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, with your permission, I should like to put a question to the senator who introduced the bill in question, that is, did he present the recommendation of the committee in both official languages of Canada because, as read by the Clerk of the Senate, it was unilingual?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am not the one who presented the recommendation. Of course, we are dealing with the report of a committee. However, since the question was directed to me and I cannot answer it, all I can say is that I would imagine it was written in English only.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I put the question to the honourable senator who presented the report, that is, Senator Bonnell and asked him whether it was tabled in one language only or in both official languages of Canada?

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the Honourable Senator Bonnell able to answer?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the report is in the translation stage at the present time. The French language copy will be here in a few minutes, if you will just wait.

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

The Hon. the Speaker: Does Senator Flynn wish to speak?

Senator Flynn: I don't know what the question is that is before the house. Are we dealing with a point of order, or a motion to have third reading deferred until tomorrow? I think that is what Senator Frith moved.

There is, however, another problem involved here, although it can be solved very easily. The point is that when a committee report, in addition to saying that a bill should be adopted without amendment, contains a recommendation—and I think I have raised this point before—the recommendation should go forward to the House of Commons to tell them what we think about the bill. This is a technical problem, and I suggest that when the committee brings in such a report it should ask the Senate to concur in the recommendation; otherwise it is meaningless, because the committee cannot speak for the Senate. I would therefore suggest that Senator Frith should perhaps ask leave tonight to move concurrence of the Senate in the report.

Senator Hayden: A recommendation.

Senator Flynn: The recommendation is, of course, included in the report. I will not discuss that with my favourite friend opposite.

Senator Hayden: It is the recommendation that makes it necessary for the Senate to act on it.

Senator Flynn: Quite so. Whatever form it may take, I think we agree on the substance. If we were to make that motion—and we could discuss it later this day at the proper time—I think we would all agree, and we could have third reading tomorrow.

Senator Lamontagne: We will be here after midnight.

Senator Flynn: But you will not be here as usual.

Senator Lamontagne: Do not start to be unfair.

Senator Flynn: Well, I may not be here either. I think this is quite important. What does it mean if we bring in a report with a recommendation and we don't tell the House of Commons what our feelings are? The minister may conclude that this is the view of a committee of the Senate but not necessarily the view of the Senate. The other place may also conclude that this is only the view of a committee.

In a case such as that we should have a motion of concurrence in the report or in the recommendation, as was suggested. If the Senate doesn't agree with the committee, that is something else. In the present case I think it would in the substance, if not necessarily in the verbiage.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not think I should do that. I do not think that I should move anything except with respect to third reading of the bill, but I think it would be a good idea for us to discuss the recommendation, if there is a way for us to do so. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can explain that portion of it, because I really feel that I am beginning to take on the role that he should take.

Senator Flynn: I was not asking you particularly. I am quite sure Senator Bonnell would do that, since it met with his approval. If he does not, I am willing to move it. I am not hard to please. You know me.

Senator Argue: You are not bashful.

Senator Frith: I don't think that I should make that motion. I would rather stick with the motion that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow. I think that is the extent to which I should make any motion.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, may I intervene for a moment? I am a little surprised that this is a mere recommendation, and I wonder if it is a mere recommendation because the committee was under the impression that this was a bill which involved the expenditure of money.

I am informed by the Law Clerk that indeed that is not so; that he has checked this with the Clerk of the Table and with the Law Clerk of the other place. There was no royal recommendation; it is not a money bill and there was, therefore, nothing whatever to prevent the committee from recommending amendments if it wanted to. But apparently it may have acted under a misapprehension.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, to clear this situation, am I to understand that the Leader of the Opposition is coming back to his original suggestion that this report be considered later this day?

Senator Flynn: And concurred in.

Senator Langlois: And to which the sponsor of the bill has agreed, with leave. If leave is granted, let's go right ahead.

Senator Grosart: He just said he would not.

Senator Flynn: And I second your motion.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: There is a motion before the house.

Senator Flynn: What?

Senator Bonnell: The motion before the house is that this bill be read a third time tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: No. No, that's not the motion.

Senator Bonnell: I understand that Senator Frith moved that the bill be read a third time tomorrow.

As I understand our rules, only one motion can be before the house at any one time. After that motion is disposed of, I am prepared to stand up and make a motion that we consider this or that or something else. We have a motion before the house and that motion must be disposed of one way or another.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I really must say that this is a peculiar reading of the regular procedure of this legislative body that we have just heard from my honourable friend the chairman of the committee.

The point that some of us were trying to make is that the motion for third reading was out of order to begin with, for the simple reason that we are faced with rule 78(5), which has not been ruled on by the Speaker, which says that if the report requires implementation by the Senate—

An Hon. Senator: It does not require that.

Senator Roblin: It does. As I read the recommendation, it proposes not merely to accept the bill but it contains a recommendation.

How in the name of goodness can you expect those of us who are not members of the committee, who never heard anything about the report until we heard it read to us tonight, to deal with this matter unless at least we have an explanation from the chairman of the committee as to why the report contains the recommendation? I do not know why that is in there. That has to be explained to us. You cannot assume, because a committee has dealt with the matter, that that is the end of it or that the house has no interest in it. I cannot offer my opinion as being authoritative by any means, but to me the plain words "proposals that require implementation by the Senate" cover the recommendation that is in the report.

● (2030)

If this report had nothing to say to us but that the bill is reported without amendment, that is one thing and there is no dispute about that. But the committee has not done that. It has reported the bill without amendment, but it has also made a recommendation that requires implementation. My plain reading of that language is that some discussion of the report of this committee is now required, and it seems to me to fly in the face of reason to think that we should have third reading of the bill before we dispose of the report of the committee that studied the bill, and that has given the house its version of what is good or bad about the bill. The house must first make up its mind about the report itself.

Honourable senators, I suggest that until the report itself is dealt with, we are not in a position to discuss third reading. I would ask the chairman of the committee whether he is prepared to move concurrence in his report, at which time we can have a proper discussion on it.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I think we are unnecessarily getting into a dilemma here by discussing something that is irrelevant to the point before the Senate. There appears to be agreement that third reading take place tomorrow; there appears to be agreement that the report be discussed tomorrow. The rule read by the honourable senator who has just taken his seat, with all due deference, is not the rule that is relevant to this point.

The report before the Senate reports the bill without amendment, but makes certain other recommendations to the government or to a ministry, as the case may be. The two things stand independently. It is not necessary, if the Senate so chooses, to ever deal with the report. It can treat it with contempt, if I may say that, and not deal with it, or it may deal with it as it wishes. This is governed by rule 78(3) and not rule 78(5).

We have only one narrow problem before us, and that is the method of getting these two motions debated. Whether the motion for third reading tomorrow, by leave, comes first, or whether the motion for the future consideration of the report comes first, are completely different questions from the method of considering the whole matter that is before us. It is simply a matter now, one motion having been made, of its being impossible to move the second motion until the first is either withdrawn or disposed of by whatever means. The Senate can either ask that it be withdrawn until the second motion is put for consideration of the report, or it can adopt it and have the other motion put for consideration tomorrow. It can debate the items on the order paper in whatever sequence it wishes or, indeed, it can pass the bill now which has not been unknown and proceed to consideration of the report weeks after the bill has been passed, but I do not suggest that in this particular case.

These are two independent matters, and the sequence of putting the motions is the only point properly before the Senate at the moment. It is obvious two motions cannot be put at the same time. One has to be put ahead of the other, either by agreement or by withdrawing the one and letting the other stand. The sequence of putting the motions is of no consequence to the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I think the problem is more technical than anything else. Nobody has to move that the bill be read the third time tomorrow. A day's notice has to be given. That is quite different. It is because of our practice that we move that third reading take place tomorrow. In fact, the sponsor of the bill just has to say he gives notice he will be moving third reading tomorrow. He does not need the approval of the Senate to do that. And if Senator Frith does so move, instead of the usual motion which is the practice, and which is wrong, I have no objection. Rule 45(1) (f) says:

One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions . . .

(f) for the adoption of a report from any standing committee;

The report of a committee with a recommendation I submit, requires one day's notice. So that if we are all in agreement, I will give notice that I will move that the report of this committee be considered for adoption tomorrow. But if you wish us to give leave to proceed tonight, then we will proceed tonight.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, on a point of clarification, I understood the honourable opposition leader to say earlier that he was prepared to give leave for discussion of the report later this day.

Senator Flynn: For the adoption of the report.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I am seeking information. My recollection is that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, through its most able chairman, has often brought reports to the Senate which did not call for amendments to bills that had been under study, but which did contain strong recommendations as to certain courses of action the administration might consider. It is also my recollection that those reports were laid on the Table without debate, and that the chairman of the committee on the following day, at the third reading stage, dealt, often at some length, with the proposals that would go forward as recommendations.

That is my recollection, but if I am in error, then I am asking to have my memory refreshed. Perhaps the chairman of that committee could give us some guidance and direction because we certainly do have precedent in reports that have been brought forward by his committee on many occasions.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, while the chairman is thinking of the reply he should give to this question, perhaps I might help Senator McElman by reminding him that there is a distinction between the report of a committee studying the subject matter of a bill and a report made on the bill itself. When you study the subject matter of a bill, you make recommendations for amendments to be brought in preferably in the other place and on the initiative of the government. But when you bring in a report with some amendments, then it has to be approved by the Senate.

Senator McElman: Excuse me, but the Leader of the Opposition is developing a different situation. There have been, in my recollection, bills that have been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—and here I am referring to bills, not to the subject matter of bills—and the committee in its consideration of them has felt that certain amendments would be desirable but due to the exigencies of time constraint, or for other reasons, it has submitted a report to the Senate containing recommendations that certain amendments be considered when further amendment of the particular legislation is contemplated. In such a case the committee had a bill before it and it made recommendations, not amendments. It is in those circumstances, I would suggest to the Leader of the Opposition, that we have precedent to follow. I would like to have my memory refreshed as to how we handled those reports, so that we can follow what we have done in the past.

● (2040)

Senator Flynn: It is not the same thing at all. In this case we are not saying that the government should amend the legislation in the next session, as in the cases you have outlined. We are saying that the government should take action now to correct it in ways other than by amendment to the legislation.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as I understand it, there is a motion before the Senate that we have third reading tomorrow.

Senator Grosart: With leave.

Senator Flynn: If Senator Frith wants to say that he gives notice that he will move third reading tomorrow, there is nothing we can do about it.

Senator Bonnell: Let me go a little further.

Senator Flynn: You do not need to.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps I do not need to, but, honourable senators, as I understand it, the Speaker asked, "When shall this bill be read the third time?" and Senator Frith stood up and said, "Tomorrow."

Senator Flynn: He gives notice.

Senator Bonnell: After that happened, a controversy took place with regard to the legality, the rules and regulations, points of order, and so forth, and we are still in the process of discussing that. There is no reason why we cannot discuss this report. I would love to discuss it. But I want to do it in order, in the proper time, and so that we will not set a precedent which might lead the Senate astray for the next generation.

Therefore, honourable senators, let us carry that motion; and after it is carried I will be prepared to move that we take this report into consideration now, later this day, or next year.

The point is that I am prepared to do it now or later this day. It would be a great opportunity for me to tell honourable senators who did not have the privilege of being present at the committee meeting about the wonderful witnesses we had, the great presentation made by the minister, and the many worthwhile questions asked by honourable senators. It was a terrific meeting, and I am sorry that the honourable senator was not there. Despite all that the honourable senator says tonight that he had no opportunity to participate, that committee meeting was open to him, and to any honourable senator. Senator Flynn attended and he certainly added to the proceedings. I do not want any honourable senator to feel that he would have been ruled out of order had he attended the committee meeting. It was an open meeting. The press was there, as well as the minister. I would love to discuss the report, but I want to do so in order. I want to know the proper procedure, following which I will be prepared to discuss the report.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I do not know whether I can make any contribution to the discussion, but I would like to find out something. As I listened to the very distinguished Senator McIlraith, he said it was rule 78(3) which applied to this particular report. However, for the life of me, I cannot follow that, because it simply says:

A report which by its own terms is for the information only of the Senate shall be laid on the table—

Surely this report is more than something for the information of the Senate. First, it reports a bill; secondly, it presents the Senate with certain recommendations, which do not amount to anything unless the Senate accepts them.

I presume, without really knowing the exact meaning of "implementation" here, that if it does accept them it is implementing them in the sense that it is sending them across to the other house. So it seems to me that it really comes under rule 78(5), and that the recommendations do require implementation if we are going to do anything at all about them.

If this report has all the great attributes which the chairman says it has, one would almost think that we should hear about them before we debate whether or not we are going to give third reading to the bill. If what went on in committee is relevant—and one would suppose it was highly relevant—to the merits of the bill, then if we are going to discuss and consider the merits of the bill, we should know what was said.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might be allowed to clear myself on this matter. Perhaps I do not fully understand the rules—and I must say, as a relatively new boy here, that I have found the entire discussion very edifying—but rule 78(4) says:

When a committee reports a bill without amendment—
So far I think we are okay. The committee reported the bill without amendment. The rule continues:

—such report shall stand adopted without any motion—
So far that seems clear.

—and the senator in charge of the bill—
I understand that is myself. I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong.

—shall move that it be read a third time—
Which is what I thought I did. Is not that right?

An Hon. Senator: That is right.

Senator Frith:

—on a future day.

We all agree that tomorrow is “a future day.” Well, I believe I have done everything I was supposed to do, and I stand by what I did.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, as I may have raised the point of order originally, perhaps I could make some comments because I think it is important that we clarify this particular situation. The first point to which I would call the attention of honourable senators—and particularly that of Senator McIlraith—is that rules 78(1), 78(2) and 78(3) do not refer in any way to a report on a bill. They are very clear that they refer to reports of committees not on bills, and rules 78(4) and 78(5) refer to reports of committees on bills.

I admit that the matter is subject to varying opinions. My own opinion is that rule 78(5) qualifies rule 78(4), but I am not going to push that point at the moment. Sooner or later it will have to be determined whether rule 78(4) covers a report of a committee to which is attached a recommendation. I was thoroughly convinced by the comment of Senator Hayden, who said the recommendation brings it before the Senate for implementation. Surely that is a reasonable interpretation if a committee recommends some action. If we read the rules we shall find that “action” means to do anything or say anything for the Senate. That is my suggestion, but I will not argue that point.

● (2050)

Perhaps the time has come for a ruling from Her Honour the Speaker on this, because the point will come up again. In the meantime, the situation, as I understand it, is that Senator Frith has moved that the bill be read the third time tomorrow. I believe the motion is not in order because rule 45(1)(b) qualifies it completely by saying:

One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions . . .

(b) for the third reading of a bill—

Therefore, if the motion is that the bill be now read the third time, I respectfully suggest that only notice can be given. If not, what is rule 45 all about?

Senator Langlois: But it is for tomorrow.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Grosart: Rule 45 says notice shall be given. If it is the intention of Senator Frith to ask leave to proceed with third reading without one day's notice—in other words, to suspend our rules—then I am prepared to consider that. I am not sure what my decision will be because I still believe the proper course of action, the sensible, reasonable course of action, would be to move concurrence in the report so that the report can be discussed. I can see nothing wrong with that. Certainly, if the original motion is withdrawn and a motion for concurrence in the report is moved, whether leave is required or not under rule 78(5), I will be prepared to give leave. I am not prepared to give leave for third reading, nor, indeed, am I prepared to give leave even for notice of third reading.

Senator Langlois: I do not want to prolong the debate on the point of order, but the question put by Her Honour the Speaker was: “When shall this bill be read the third time?”. There was no motion for the adoption of the report or for consideration of the report. In reply to that the sponsor of the bill said, “Tomorrow.”

Senator Grosart: A point of order has been raised that that is not in order.

Senator Lang: Question!

Senator Langlois: The motion was that the bill be placed on the order paper for third reading tomorrow. If that is not notice, I don't know what notice is.

Senator Lang: Question!

Senator Flynn: I would say to you, Senator Lang, “Don't push it! Don't get excited.” When you say, “Question!”, you say, “Just don't consider the points of order that have been raised.” I would say that that is not the way to end a debate. If you have any judgment you should know that.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, to assist Her Honour the Speaker in making a decision on the point of order, I should like to clarify the situation.

Senator Grosart: Make sure you have the right rule book in front of you.

Senator Bonnell: There is no doubt that what Senator Frith did was in order. He made a motion according to rule 78(4). The doubt only arises under rule 78(5), which contains the phrase “proposals that require implementation by the Senate.” That is where the doubt comes in. When there is doubt then, according to our rules, we go by precedents. The precedent has been set here since 1867.

Senator Flynn: Of course, you were here.

Senator Bonnell: In fact, just a few weeks ago on November 20, 1978, the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science presented its report on the Old Age Security Act, and I should like to read that report to you so that you can see how the Senate disposed of it.

Senator Flynn: And we will all fall asleep.

Senator Bonnell: I will read the report. You will notice that in this case it is Bill C-5 instead of Bill C-2, but that is the only change:

The Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, to which was referred Bill C-5, "An Act to amend the Old Age Security Act", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, November 20, 1978, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

The committee nevertheless strongly recommends that the Government consider the advisability of introducing at the earliest possible opportunity an amendment to this bill that would have the effect of making clause 2 of the bill retroactive to November 1, 1978.

Honourable senators, that bill went on to third reading the same day, according to the rules, and that is the precedent to this day.

If Her Honour the Speaker wishes to make a ruling on her own, that is fine, but I would suggest that how we deal with recommendations by committees is a matter we should debate at another time. In the meantime I think we should carry on in an orderly fashion, as we have done since 1867, and go on to third reading tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, under rule 78(4) I must put the question again.

It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bird, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading tomorrow. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Bonnell: So that honourable senators will have an opportunity to understand what the committee meant when it made this report I should like, with leave, to put this report on the order paper for discussion later this day. I ask that so we can discuss the report without breaking the precedents.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Grosart: Later this day?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Grosart: No. Honourable senators, I will not give leave for the discussion of a report of a committee after a motion has been made for third reading. I positively refuse to grant leave, just as a matter of respect for the rules and procedures in this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, do you not think the report could be discussed after the motion for third reading has been put?

Senator Flynn: At any rate, leave has not been granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Well—

Senator Bonnell: Do I understand that one senator objects to hearing how the problems of some of the provinces are being dealt with?

Senator Grosart: Yes.

Senator Flynn: Not only one. There are many on the other side who object as well.

Senator Bonnell: They object? Perhaps we should have a vote, if there are many who object.

Senator Roblin: Let me make my position clear, honourable senators. I will not give leave either, and I will explain why I will not give leave. I think I am entitled to do that.

Senator Lang: Order!

Senator Roblin: I was not a member of this committee—

Senator Lang: Order!

Senator Roblin: I beg your pardon?

Senator Lang: Order!

Senator Roblin: Madam Speaker is the only person here who is entitled to call me to order. If she chooses to do so, I will pay attention to her. So far as you are concerned, I will keep on with what I have to say, and what I have to say is this: I am not a member of this committee. I have a number of other committee meetings to attend and in spite of the generous invitation of my honourable friend the chairman of the committee I do not think it is reasonable to expect senators to attend meetings of all the committees that they may not be members of.

That is just a debating point to which we will give the credit it deserves, but what I have in mind is this: A report has been presented to the Senate tonight raising some objections to a bill. There must have been a substantial reason for that. We are being asked now, if we follow the course that has been recommended, to approve the bill anyway on third reading regardless of what the exceptions are and with no opportunity to amend the bill on third reading since we do not know what the cause at issue is. I suggest to this house that it does not make any sense for us not to discuss the committee report before we debate the bill. However, we have gone over that.

● (2100)

What I also suggest is that it is not really sensible to ask members of the house to debate the committee report—which is what would happen if my honourable friend had his way—when we have not seen it. It has been read to us, but we have not seen it and we have not had any opportunity to study it. I, for one, think that it does not make sense to proceed with a discussion of this committee report under these circumstances until we have a chance to read it. That is the reason why I do not think we should proceed with it now.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Next sitting.

Senator Roblin: Next sitting.

CONSERVATION OF ENERGY SUPPLIES

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Senator Hayden moved, seconded by Senator Laird, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(c):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and report upon the subject matter of the Bill C-42, intituled: "An Act to provide a means to conserve the supplies of energy within Canada during periods of national emergency caused by shortages or market disturbances affecting the national security and welfare and the economic stability of Canada," in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

THE GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD—QUESTION

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I have tried without success to contact the Leader of the Government by telephone, so I am afraid I will have to put my question to the Acting Leader of the Government tonight. I shall try to be brief in my preamble, but it is a question that is of prime concern to the Senate. We are all aware that we have been served well during the past few years by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Mr. Vandelac. We know, too, that he reached retirement age some few months ago and that he has stayed on by virtue of his devotion to carrying out his functions. However, this situation cannot continue for too long, and I am very concerned as to his replacement, how he will be chosen and when. I would be happy if Mr. Vandelac could stay with us for many years, but I am afraid that under legislative sanction his term is somewhat limited.

My question to the Acting Leader of the Government is this: Is a replacement for Mr. Vandelac as Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod under active consideration? If so, what considerations are being taken into account as to his replacement, and what are the qualifications of that person? Is that replacement to be dictated by the executive or is it to be decided by the Senate through its normal processes, which would be a recommendation of the Internal Economy Committee to the Senate?

Honourable senators, I am asking this question because, quite frankly, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod is one of the most important officers in the Senate. He is a senior executive officer, and I feel that it is absolutely of prime importance that we ourselves, through our committee systems and recommendations, should decide who Mr. Vandelac's successor will be. We might end up with a replacement that could never emulate his excellence.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before answering this question, I should like to join with my honourable friend in his commendation of the good services performed by Mr. Vandelac.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Langlois: As far as his replacement is concerned, I must inform the house that I have no official information in this respect. However, in answer to the second part of the question, I should say that the appointment of a successor is the prerogative of the Prime Minister. That has been a practice of very long standing, and I do not think that the Internal Economy Committee would have anything to do with it.

Senator Lang: May I ask a supplementary question? Is there any legal authority for the appointment of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod being the prerogative of the Prime Minister extant? Are we to abide by a custom which may be long outdated?

• (2110)

Senator Langlois: I could check on this. As I just said, my understanding is that according to practice of very long standing this appointment comes under the Prime Minister.

AIR CANADA

TELEPHONE SERVICE AT MONCTON AIRPORT—QUESTION

Senator Norrie: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Acting Leader of the Government. Before I ask the question, I should like to tell you a few things concerning the matter that is bothering me. Today I was coming here on a plane sitting beside a nicely dressed middle-aged gentleman. He was on his way to Montreal to receive a kidney transplant. He had been called at 7 o'clock the night before to get to Montreal immediately. He tried to get in touch with Moncton airport from 7 o'clock until midnight but could get no reply whatsoever. He therefore left it until the morning and called again at a quarter-past six. The plane for Montreal leaves Moncton at 8 o'clock, and when he couldn't get a reply to his call he went right out to the airport, and fortunately was able to get one of the two or three empty seats available.

I was very upset about the whole incident. There was apparently no means by which this man could get an emergency call into the airport. I called Montreal airport just before the Senate sat tonight and spoke to a gentleman—I suppose he was a gentleman, although he did not act like one—and I asked if there was any way of getting in touch with Moncton airport from 7 o'clock at night until midnight. He said, "Of course there is. There is no question about it. That airport is supposed to be open. He could have done so if he had rung the right number." I then said that I would like to speak to somebody who could give me the information that I needed, that the man I was referring to was a very truthful, fine man who could be trusted to call the right number. I asked, "Would you give me the number of somebody I can call, even the president?" The man I was speaking to said, "Are you kidding?" I replied, "No, I am not kidding." He then said, "Well, I'm not wasting my time talking to people like you." That is what he said.

I immediately hung up, called again and got in touch with a lady, a real lady, who told me that of course it was a terrible thing, but that the Air Canada phone is closed from 7 o'clock at night until 7 o'clock in the morning, and there was no way that anybody could have got in touch with them except by calling Montreal or Ottawa, which I think have the same number after hours.

There was no emergency telephone number to call at Moncton airport, and on behalf of the ordinary citizens around Moncton, which is a very big area, I should like to know why there is not some service available to them in an emergency. That man was over a barrel. Luckily, I think he has now had the operation, because I think there are only a few hours available during which a kidney can be transplanted.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I understand, due to the complexity of the question, that the honourable senator does not expect me to answer her tonight. However, I will undertake to investigate this matter very closely and provide her with an answer at the next opportunity.

I might say that in the province of Quebec a service is provided by the provincial government, in the case of such an emergency, on the recommendation of a hospital or the doctor attending the patient. The province provides, at any time of the day or night, provincial aircraft to take patients to the hospital. This facility has been in existence for a long time in my province.

Senator Norrie: Thank you.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPORTED INFANT DEATHS ON NORTHERN ALBERTA RESERVES—QUESTION

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government whether he is able to give us some information tonight about the reports of several infant deaths that have occurred on two northern Alberta Indian reserves.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I have heard of press reports about these deaths on Indian reserves in northern Alberta. I shall inquire from the Department of National Health and Welfare and provide the information at a later date.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND BILL—REPRESENTATIONS TO COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. My question is whether, in relation to the hearings on Bill C-2, in respect of which he reported tonight, there were any persons—

Senator Riley: You are out of order.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Look at rule 20 and you will find out whether or not I am in order.

Were there any persons who wished to be heard during that hearing who were not in fact heard, to the knowledge of the chairman?

Senator Flynn: Not to his knowledge.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, in the first place, I do not believe that I have to answer any question. I think questions can only be directed to the Leader of the Government or the acting leader. However, I should like to answer the question.

Senator Flynn: Do it.

Senator Bonnell: Yes, we had requests from the Province of British Columbia, from the Minister of Health and, I believe, the Minister of Education, but no decision was made by our committee to hear them.

Senator Smith (Colchester): On the question whether I am in order, I should like to refer the distinguished chairman of the committee and Senator Riley to rule 20(1)(c), which says:

When the Speaker calls the question period, a senator may, without notice, address an oral question to

(c) the chairman of a committee, if it is a question relating to the activities of that committee.

Senator Flynn: He has to learn.

Senator Bonnell: That's fine. I am prepared to answer questions.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is all right. You answered it very nicely, and I appreciate it.

● (2120)

[Later:]

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask a further question of the Chairman of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee. He has been kind enough to inform us that certain persons who wished to be heard by the committee were not heard. I wonder if he would also be kind enough to give us the reasons for that decision by the committee.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the main reason behind the decision of the committee was the fact that Bill C-2 involved an amendment to a federal statute. The Health Resources Fund Act was not the subject of a federal-provincial agreement. The purpose of Bill C-2 was to terminate the Health Resources Fund a year and some months ahead of its original expiry date, and certainly in light of that it was felt by the committee that every province would probably object to its passage. It was the feeling that we had nothing further to learn from the provinces. We had received a brief from one province outlining their objection and we had the response of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Senator Flynn: Is it always the attitude of your committee to refuse to hear those who oppose passage of a bill? Perhaps you don't want them to change your mind.

Senator Forsey: It reminds me of the Irish magistrate who said he never listens to the defence. He finds it confusing.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the leader of the committee—

Senator Flynn: No, he is not the leader. He is following the instruction of his leader.

Senator Smith (Colchester): I apologize for having used a title which was not strictly correct. I should like to direct a further question to the chairman of the committee.

Is it your view that such refusal is in accord with the regional duties of the Senate?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I can only answer that by saying we did not refuse to hear the provinces. A motion was made to the effect that we report the bill without amendment, and that motion carried. Given that the motion carried, I saw no reason to try to overrule it.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is not a refusal. I still would like the chairman of the committee, if he would, to answer the question. Does he consider that such a decision, whether by motion or otherwise, is consistent with the regional responsibilities of the Senate?

Senator McIlraith: That would be a reflection on other members of the committee.

Senator Smith (Colchester): It is not a reflection on other members of the committee. It is a straightforward question and one which no one seems to want to answer.

Senator Flynn: Silence is a good answer.

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—TERMS OF REFERENCE AND REPORTING PROCEDURES—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Acting Leader of the Government about the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity. Could he tell us why it was abolished, and what is expected of the National Commission on Inflation that will take its place?

Senator Langlois: I think this information was contained in the statement made in the other place by the Minister of Finance a few days ago. I will inquire if that statement covered all the points raised by the honourable senator, and provide whatever information needs to be added to that statement by the Minister of Finance.

Senator Roblin: I agree that there has been some press information about the minister's statement, and I have a copy of some of it in my hand. When the acting leader makes his inquiry, would he also obtain for us the terms of reference of the National Commission on Inflation, so that we may know what it is supposed to do?

Perhaps he could also explain to us why a change has been made in the reporting procedures of the two bodies. I refer to the fact that the original body, the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity, made its reports direct to the public, whereas, if my information is correct, in the case of the National Commission on Inflation the reports are made to the minister. It seems to me that if the new body is to succeed in its function of promoting public understanding of the inflationary process and its implications for the economy, it would be wise if those reports were made to the public rather than filtered through the minister's hands.

Senator Langlois: I shall take those two questions as notice.

[Senator Flynn.]

BANKRUPTCY BILL, 1979

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Laird, for the second reading of the Bill S-14, intituled: "An Act respecting bankruptcy and insolvency".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not think it would serve any purpose for me to speak to this bill this evening. I am quite sure the Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is not yet ready to consider the bill, and perhaps will not be until next week. It is therefore my intention to have the matter stand until next week—possibly Monday, Senator Langlois?

Senator Langlois: If you wish to be here Monday for a change, that's fine.

Senator Flynn: I merely want some indication from you as to when we might sit next week.

Senator Langlois: I am always ready to accommodate my honourable friend.

Senator Flynn: Will we be sitting Monday or Tuesday?

Senator Langlois: I will do my best to accommodate my honourable friend's wishes.

Order stands.

CANADA WINTER GAMES, BRANDON, MANITOBA—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William J. Patten rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 28, 1979:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Canada Winter Games held at Brandon, Manitoba, from 12th to 24th February, 1979.

He said: Honourable senators, the Canada Winter Games were held at Brandon, Manitoba, from February 12 to 24 last, bringing together some 2,500 athletes from the various provinces and territories. I was very fortunate in having the opportunity to attend these Games during the second week of competition. The enthusiasm and dedication of the participants and the support staff was fantastic as they vied for the medals—gold, silver and bronze. However, what struck one most forcefully was the friendships that developed, both on and off the various fields or courts of endeavour. From the east, west, north and south, good fellowship prevailed throughout. Friendships were made that I am sure will endure. One could not attend the Games without being caught up in the enthusiasm and goodwill that was so much in evidence.

My wife and I, while not participants, were running many 220 and 440 yard dashes in order to attend the various events.

The Province of Manitoba and, particularly, the citizens of the Brandon area, did an outstanding job of hosting the Games. More than 3,000 volunteers conveyed a heartwarming and smiling welcome to all visitors. Long hours meant nothing to them. To give you an example, one lady was on duty each day from eight in the morning until ten in the evening. She was only one of many.

On the Manitoba automobile licence plates are the words "Friendly Manitoba." That is an understatement. Friendly, yes; but I would add warm and hospitable. They are just great people.

Throughout the Games, as I have said, the competition was keen but friendly. The province of Quebec was the overall winner, and their athletes are to be congratulated for their fine showing. All the other provinces and territories may well be proud of the efforts put forth by their representatives.

The Yukon won the Centennial Cup for the most improved group over the Winter Games held at Lethbridge, Alberta, in 1975. My congratulations to them.

My province of Newfoundland was runner-up to the Yukon Territory on the improvement list. Newfoundland, for the first time, had participants in every event.

I should like now to expand on the participation of the Newfoundland athletes. A gold medal went to Christine and Dominic Pike of St. John's in the Junior Dance competition in figure skating. A brother, Robert, also participated and acquitted himself well. A silver went to the men's curling team made up of Mark Noseworthy, Brian Stacey, Eugene Trickett and Terry Piper of St. John's. One bronze went to Noel Murphy of St. John's for judo, and another to Karen Furlong of St. John's for racquet ball. Kathy Wells of Springdale took fourth place in table tennis with 40 wins out of 45 games, and Kathy Parsons of Portugal Cove finished fourth in the racquet ball competition. Those are just a few examples. All our athletes played a part in improving our overall standing.

Some 11 parents from Newfoundland journeyed to Brandon to see their sons and daughters compete. Two of these parents were Mr. and Mrs. White of Stephenville on Newfoundland's west coast. They came to see Inez, 10, and Scott, 14, who participated in figure skating. They had not seen Inez and Scott since Christmas when the children had gone to St. John's for coaching in figure skating and to attend school.

The Newfoundland mission staff, consisting of Jane Rat-tray, Adrian Miller, Cy Hoskins, Sandy Hickman, Robin Scott and Cec Soper, and led by Bob Hillier, did an outstanding job. To the participants, coaches and staff I say, "Well done," and, in saying that they will understand, "Long may your big jib draw."

The CBC television coverage of the opening and closing ceremonies was first rate. However, the daily coverage left a lot to be desired. In this thought I am not alone. Daily coverage consisted of 15 minutes at 11.45 p.m. in Ontario, and later in Atlantic Canada. This time of viewing certainly did not do anything to enable young Canadians to see their friends and neighbours participating in the competition.

The Games, in my view, contribute greatly to national unity, for the fine young athletes who take part are our leaders of tomorrow. What better way to promote understanding, to get to know each other better, than through the Games, both winter and summer?

The CBC, I feel, had the responsibility, as the national network, to enable the folks at home to view these competitions and to see the friendly atmosphere that was prevalent throughout the Games. Is it not part of the role of our national network to provide to Canadians, wherever they live in this great country of ours, the opportunity to view events of this type? CBC has the capacity to do the job. They have proven this on many occasions. Why not this time? This was "Canadian content" in a style and of a calibre that far exceed so much of the current material being telecast. I deeply regret that the CBC failed to give appropriate coverage to this spectacular event.

Honourable senators, it was both a pleasure and a privilege to be present in Brandon for the Canada Winter Games and to participate in the happy and friendly atmosphere that prevailed there.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I am delighted that my honourable friend from Newfoundland broke the ice, because he can say those things about Manitoba much more eloquently than I can, since I am a native of that province. I do appreciate the fact that he refrained from telling us that the weather was about the coldest we have had in Brandon, Manitoba, for many a long year, and I am really delighted that so many Canadians from outside our province were able to stand up to the rigors of a Manitoba winter during the course of these Games.

Senator Langlois: They say Labrador is colder.

Senator Roblin: Well, Labrador has its points.

Senator Petten: It was due to the warmth of the people.

Senator Roblin: I am coming to that. Brandon is a rather small place as cities go—it has about 35,000 people—and to mount the Canada Winter Games in that community represented a very ambitious undertaking for the people of the area. What carried them through, I think, is something that I notice in my contact with people in Canada generally, but particularly with regard to my fellow citizens in Manitoba, and that is that they have nothing to learn about the voluntary spirit, because so much of what was done in those Games was done by volunteers, both from Brandon and from the countryside around about it. They performed, certainly, in a way that one would expect.

I was particularly touched, honourable senators, to have Senator Petten speak to us of the friendliness of the people, because if there is anyone who is a good judge of friendship and warmheartedness, it has to be our citizens of Newfoundland. Any time I have been there they have certainly outdone themselves in expressing their pleasure at visitors coming to that delightful island. I am glad to hear that that feeling of friendliness, which I think we identify with ourselves, was recognized by at least one visitor and, I am sure, many others, during the course of those very successful Games.

As we have just been told, this was, of course, a Canadian occasion. We Manitobans were lucky to be at the centre of it, but it was a Canadian occasion, and I am sure a lot of us got a little bit of a thrill that the Province of Quebec did so well. As a matter of fact, they wiped the board, did they not? I suppose there are many satisfied people in this chamber with respect to such an excellent record, but anyone who takes part in those Games, whether they bring home a gold or silver medal, or a bronze, has a part to play. You do not have Games without competition. Competition necessarily involves some being successful, and others who are less so; but all who come to the Games have a chance to improve their capacity in the athletic realm. That is where they learn what it is all about. They are not a set of Games for national champions, they are for those who, we hope, will become national champions. In that sense the Games were certainly most successful.

I therefore want to thank my honourable friend for his courtesy in raising this matter and for the kind things he said about my province. He is probably right about the CBC, and I know we look forward to the next Winter Games, to be held in some other part of our country, where, I am sure, they will be equally memorable and successful.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Honourable Senator Petten a question about the CBC coverage, and the inadequacy of it, that he referred to.

Am I correct in thinking that when these Games were held in Newfoundland the CBC gave much fuller coverage?

Senator Petten: I can answer that very briefly. They certainly did. As I said, they have the capacity to do it. They have proved this on other occasions, and the Games in Newfoundland were one of them.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I want to add my criticism to that expressed by Senator Petten and others on the way in which the CBC reported the Games at Brandon a few days ago.

To refer to one item only. Repeatedly, night after night, I listened, as did millions of others, to the CBC after the news and the weather report in order to hear the sports report. What was the first item reported? Some hockey game down in Houston. And the next item? Something up in Cincinnati. Most of the report was about events in the United States. Way down the list, five minutes afterwards, towards the end, we got a report as to what had happened at Brandon.

We in Newfoundland sent the largest contingent we have ever sent outside the province to an event of this kind, and we were naturally deeply interested in what was happening, as was everyone right across Canada; but over and over we had to sit and be subjected to this humiliation of having the CBC report things going on in the sports world down in Houston and elsewhere in the United States. How many people, in God's name, in Canada, were interested in the precise score of some game down in Cincinnati or over in Cleveland, or down in Houston or Dallas, or wherever it might have been, at a time when hundreds, indeed, I suppose, several thousands of Canadians, were participating in the Canada Winter Games over in Manitoba. I do not know whose judgment it was that prevailed with regard to the CBC's programming. All I can say is that it is a national disgrace.

● (2140)

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, if I may delay you for just a moment, Senator Petten's report on the Canada Winter Games in Brandon brought back pleasant memories to me, because I was mayor of the host city in 1971. I refer, of course, to that great city of Saskatoon. We hosted the Canada Winter Games and set an example that communities have tried to emulate, and I think most of them have done so quite successfully.

I can certainly endorse everything Senator Petten has said about the friendliness, the spirit and the warm feeling that prevails at such sporting events as the Canada Winter Games, and how important they are to our country.

I want to raise a point that Senator Petten did not deal with, and that is the legacy of the Canada Winter Games to the host community—the capital developments, the facilities that are provided to the community. These are financed, if previous arrangements still prevail, on the basis of a one-third contribution federally, a one-third contribution provincially, and a one-third contribution locally. Hosting the Canada Winter Games gives a community the opportunity to develop facilities which it would otherwise never be able to afford.

I am very proud that in my city we built a mountain for skiing. When we asked for the Canada Winter Games we had to have a facility for downhill skiing. Although we have a great city which reaches the highest pinnacles in every way, we really do not have many hills for skiing. So we came up with the idea of building a mountain, and we did. We moved a million cubic feet of earth and developed a facility 25 miles from Saskatoon. It is not exactly Banff, but it was officially opened by Nancy Greene, who said it was a good facility. Since then it has developed a real interest in skiing, and nowadays literally hundreds use the facility. On a good day you will see fifteen hundred people skiing on that mountain, a facility that would never have existed had it not been for the Canada Winter Games.

I thought I would remind honourable senators of what happened in Saskatoon, and let you know that the legacy of capital facilities is something that communities appreciate.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I hesitate to participate in this debate, but I concur in what has been said by preceding speakers, and would add that I was very proud to see young people from Quebec participate so successfully in these events.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Desruisseaux: The young athletes from Quebec have trained thoroughly. Their achievements show what they can do when they subject themselves to the discipline of training.

I represent the electoral division of Wellington. Athletes from that electoral division won 17 medals, ten of them gold. Sylvie Daigle, a young girl 16 years of age, showed her athletic prowess by winning four of those medals.

These young people were enthusiastic and happy. I watched the closing of the Canada Winter Games, and was very pleased to see those friendly and happy young people from all over the country. It speaks well for the future of Canada. I hope all goes well with the 1980 Olympics in Moscow.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

THE CHIEF JUSTICE OF QUEBEC SUPERIOR COURT—THE HONOURABLE JULES DESCHÊNES

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I was looking for Senator Wagner, but since I am on my feet, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the presence in the gallery of the Chief Justice of the Quebec Superior Court, the Honourable Jules Deschênes.

I do not know whether he is here to supervise the third reading of the Judges Act. Of course, there is nothing in it that is very interesting, except that he will have a few more judges to help him discharge his duties.

I welcome him most warmly.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, yesterday a point of order was raised in connection with the report on Bill C-2, an Act to amend the Health Resources Fund Act, by the Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which reported the bill without amendment but with observations and a recommendation. Pursuant to rule 78(4), the report stands adopted without any motion and the senator in charge of the bill, the Honourable Senator Frith, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

On November 28, 1978, as reported on page 271 of the Debates of the Senate, I referred to the custom and usage that when a Commons bill is passed by the Senate without amendment, a written message is sent to the House of Commons to that effect, and the original parchment of the bill is kept here. Only when the Senate amends a Commons bill is the original parchment returned to the House of Commons with the engrossed amendments attached thereto. I informed the Senate that it is simply a matter of custom and usage and it has never been the custom to include the recommendations or observations of a committee in a message to the other place with respect to the passage of a bill. I said that there was nothing in the rules or in the authors on parliamentary practice to prevent the inclusion of observations in a message, but I suggested that each case should be judged on its own merits and that the Senate should decide in each instance if it is advisable and in the interest of the Senate to include the recommendations or observations in the message.

The first test resulting from this suggestion came up last evening on the report of Bill C-2.

The debate last evening does not alter my opinion, but the difficulty arises in the difference of opinions expressed by honourable senators on whether or not a motion for adoption of the report should precede the motion for third reading. On this I should like to point out that in all the precedents, and there are quite a few—I found at least nine—where a bill was reported without amendment but with observations or recommendations, the observations and recommendations were for the information only of the Senate, and were treated as such. On motion under rule 78(3) the report, of course, could be placed on the Orders of the Day for future consideration. Never was a motion proposed to adopt such a report and never was it suggested that the bill be not treated in accordance with rule 78(4), which says that it stands adopted without any motion, and that the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day. This is what happened last evening, and the bill is on today's orders for third reading.

As honourable senators know, the report is printed in the Minutes and Proceedings of the Senate and in the Debates of the Senate. That alone should ensure that members of the House of Commons are informed of the observations contained therein, but some senators feel that for greater certainty the observations should also be included in the message. This brings to light a procedural difficulty since it raises the question of whether a report of a committee that reports a Commons bill without amendment but with recommendations or observations should be adopted before being included in the message to the other house.

I would therefore suggest to honourable senators that, in view of the difference of opinions voiced last night, the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders study the matter and report to the Senate on the procedure that should be followed when a Commons bill is reported without amendment but with observations or recommendations, and that until then the procedure that has been followed in the past be continued.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, pursuant to section 115 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, Chapter P-35, R.S.C., 1970.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION INCOME TAX

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE PUBLICATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF REPORTS OF THE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, at this point I should like to ask that the two motions standing in Senator Hayden's name be brought forward. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is meeting later this afternoon, and the bringing forward of these two motions at this point would accommodate him.

Senator Flynn: While I wish to accommodate Senator Hayden, I don't know how long the debate on these motions might last. There are other matters before the Senate that should take precedence. If it only takes a few minutes, I will be happy to agree, but if debate on these motions is to last more than five or ten minutes, I think it should be postponed until tomorrow. There is nothing urgent in these two motions, I suggest to you.

Senator Hayden: I can only speak for myself. In moving and explaining these two motions, I will only be a few minutes. However, I cannot tell how long my friend might take in any contribution he might have.

Senator Flynn: I am quite satisfied with the answer given by Senator Hayden. However, as he himself said, others may take much longer.

Senator Walker: We would love to hear from Senator Hayden.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I move:

That the honourable senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments be authorized to publish and distribute the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-15, intituled: "An Act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof".

If the Senate will agree to consider the two motions together, I will now move the second motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, I move:

That the honourable senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments be authorized to publish and distribute the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-37, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, to amend the Canada Pension Plan and to provide other authority for the raising of funds".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Laird:

That the honourable senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate—

Hon. Senators: Disperse.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motions?

● (1410)

Senator Flynn: I am sorry, but I would like to hear these two-minute speeches.

Senator Hayden: My two-minute speeches?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, these are motions that are usually made towards the end of every session of Parliament and at times they have been made in relation to that period of time between the dissolution of one Parliament and the convening of the next. I have sought precedents and I have found them for session after session. I even found one which indicates that the Leader of the Opposition participated in a discussion on this very subject in March 1972.

Senator Flynn: Was it a bill I introduced?

Senator Hayden: It was a motion dealing with any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments—the same kind of motion that I have proposed today.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest you read the rest of the motion.

Senator Hayden: It reads as follows:

That during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments, the Leader of the Government in the Senate and a senator to be named by him from time to time and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, or a senator to be named by him from time to time, be authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate;

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has done a very substantial amount of work in relation to Bill C-15 and Bill C-37, and we have reached a point of termination of proceedings and the completion of a draft report in relation to both these items. So for one thing I would hate to think that I would be given a period of some months to forget about it and then be faced with it in two or three months' time and have to refresh my memory, whereas we could crystalize it at this time.

Senator Flynn: And refresh the memories of the members of the committee.

Senator Hayden: That is right. The reason for making the motion is that rumour alley seems to be full of rumours these days as to the pending dissolution of Parliament. Therefore I thought I should move as early as I could to settle the matter.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I will move the adjournment of the debate on this motion because there is more to it, I would think, than the mover has indicated. It is not my intention to oppose the motion, but I think I should put on the record some of my concerns in connection with this. Therefore I shall deal with it tomorrow. I am quite sure that if the honourable senator cannot be here tomorrow he need have no worry about the passage of his motion. But I have some doubts about the constitutionality of the powers that would be given to the committee.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I wonder if I might address a question to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science with relation to the proceedings of that committee on Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act. I understand that, as he answered me yesterday, his committee, or he on behalf of his committee, received a communication from or on behalf of the Government of British Columbia asking to be heard by the committee in relation to Bill C-2.

Has the chairman answered that communication? If so, what has he said?

Senator Bonnell: The answer to your question is no.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on February 28 Senator Roblin asked a question with respect to the International Energy Agency. He wondered whether the material from the OECD gives the regulations of the International Energy Agency which Canada has agreed to subscribe to.

May I say that the obligations assumed by the member countries of the IEA are found, basically, in three instruments. The first is the Agreement on an International Energy Program, signed in November 1974. This agreement provided for establishment of the IEA and for administration by the IEA of a program for emergency self-sufficiency, demand restraint, standby allocation and information on the international oil market. It is this agreement that provides for activation of the IEA emergency oil sharing system, if the normal total level of oil supplies to IEA countries is reduced by more than 7 per cent.

The second instrument was the Long-Term Co-operation Program, LTCP, adopted by the IEA governing board in January 1976. This program, essentially an extension of the International Energy Program, provides broad policy guidelines in the areas of conservation, accelerated development of alternative energy sources and energy research and development. In joining the governing board agreement on the LTCP, Canada stipulated that it could not consider itself bound by Chapter V of the program. Chapter V is addressed to improvement of conditions of energy investments and trade, and the Canadian reservation was based on constitutional and foreign investment considerations.

The third basic IEA policy instrument was a decision adopted by the governing board, meeting at ministerial level, in October 1977. This decision established IEA group objectives for total oil imports and 12 principles of energy policy intended to serve as further guidelines for the implementation of national measures in such areas as conservation, switching to the use of more plentiful fuels, and expansion of indigenous energy supplies.

Copies of the above instruments can be made available to Senator Roblin and other honourable senators should they wish to have them.

STRATEGIC OIL RESERVES IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, also on February 28 Senator Roblin asked a question with respect to strategic oil reserves in the Atlantic provinces.

As Senator Langlois explained in his remarks on this subject in the Senate on February 28, 1979, with regard to oil reserves in the Atlantic provinces, Canada does not have strategic petroleum reserves for civilian use, either in the maritimes or elsewhere in the country. The supplying companies do, for operational reasons, maintain relatively higher stocks in the Atlantic provinces than in other parts of Canada. These operational factors are many and they include separation from a pipeline facility and climate and density of population in relation to relatively high dependence on oil as an energy source.

ENERGY SUPPLIES EMERGENCY BILL

PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on February 28 Senator Olson asked if, in relation to the Energy Supplies Emergency bill, it was the intention to withhold final passage of Bill C-42 until some time after a meeting of provincial deputy ministers of energy and the federal government.

I should like to point out that a meeting of federal and provincial deputy ministers of energy is planned before the end of the week of March 19, 1979, to consider current energy matters, including Bill C-42, the Energy Supplies Emergency bill. But it is my understanding, honourable senators, that it is nevertheless the government's intention to advance the bill through Parliament in the interim period of time.

GRAIN

PURCHASE OF HOPPER CARS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked by Senator Argue on February 13 concerning hopper cars and Crowsnest Pass rates. The honourable senator inquired about the government's leadership in the provision of an adequate number of rail cars for grain transport.

To date the government has purchased 8,000 hopper cars at a total cost of $257.8 million and has rehabilitated 2,400 boxcars. A further 2,000 boxcars are currently being rehabilitated and it is hoped to carry out work on an additional 1,000 boxcars.

While the hopper car, with its rapid loading and unloading characteristics, together with a greater capacity, is undoubtedly superior to the boxcar, we must not lose sight of the fact that many prairie rail lines are still not capable of handling hopper cars. A number of these lines will likely be abandoned, while the balance will be upgraded under the prairie railway rehabilitation program, which will cost in the $700 million to $900 million range and will likely take 10 years to complete. It is important to recognize that hopper car acquisitions, boxcar retirements, and branch line upgrading must go hand in hand to ensure a smooth transition to a modern system.

We currently have under way a grain transportation operations analysis which, among other things, will give Canada an investment program, together with the timing for hopper car acquisition. This will take into account the factors set out above and will allow a reasoned approach to the problem.

In the meantime the Wheat Board has decided to order an additional 2,000 hopper cars. This is seen as an interim measure pending resolution of the long-term issue.

Turning now to Senator Benidickson's question concerning the Crowsnest Pass rates, I can do no better than attach a 1978 report that sets out in some detail the impact of the statutory rate upon the railways and their operations.

Honourable senators, it will be my intention to provide this very lengthy report to Senator Benidickson. After reviewing it, he may wish to ask further questions. The document is really too lengthy to be incorporated in today's proceedings.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENT TO PUBLISH "LABOUR GAZETTE"—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, regarding a question of long standing concerning the Labour Gazette, which was originally asked by Senator Forsey but in which other senators have expressed interest, for many years the Labour

Gazette was virtually the only journal of record in the labour affairs field, but that role has since been taken up by specialized publications and other periodicals, daily, weekly and monthly. As a result, over the past few years extensive consideration has been given to redefining the role of the Labour Gazette and its French language counterpart, La Gazette du travail, but efforts to reshape the publications and increase their circulation met with only modest success.

During August 1978, when government departments were directed to make expenditure reductions, continuation of the Gazettes had to be weighed in relation to other activities of the department. The magnitude of the budgetary cuts was such that the department had little alternative but to eliminate certain program activities in their entirety and to substantially reduce others. Based on a review of program priorities, it was reluctantly concluded that certain departmental publications, including the Labour Gazette and La Gazette du travail should be discontinued.

In reaching this decision it was noted that the annual cost of publishing the Labour Gazette and La Gazette du travail, as estimated for the full fiscal year 1979-80, was $225,000. The paid circulation of the Labour Gazette was approximately 2,800 and of La Gazette du travail approximately 750 copies. Based on publishing costs and circulation figures, each paid annual subscription was costing the department more than $60 compared with a subscription price of $7.50 per year. It is difficult to justify underwriting each subscription by more than $50 a year.

To achieve the anticipated expenditure reductions, publication had to cease by the end of 1978. Bill C-30, to amend the Department of Labour Act, given first reading on December 15, 1978, accommodates discontinuance of the Labour Gazette on January 1, 1979. Retroactive application of legislation is not an unusual process, as in this instance.

The government is hopeful that time will be found in the legislative schedule of the present session, before events to come, to permit passage of Bill C-30.

[Translation]

Senator Forsey: All this may be fine, honourable senators, but it has no relevance to the point I raised, which was that this violates the law.

I am all for saving money. That is fine. But the law must still be obeyed, as far as I know.

I was brought up in a home where the rule of law was absolutely basic.

Constitutionally, I am a conservative of the school of Sir John A. Macdonald. I remain of that view, and believe that no government has any right whatsoever to break the law, even if this could save billions.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand the continuing concern of the honourable senator with respect to the legality of this action. All I can do is quote once again the view expressed by the Minister of Labour that the retroactive application of legislation is not an unusual process, such as in this instance. If the honourable senator requires precedents to reinforce the opinion of the minister, I would be pleased to seek them out.

Senator Forsey: I am well aware that we can pass retroactive legislation—it has been done many times, sometimes in matters very much worse than this, and in much more glaring cases—but the process of passing retroactive legislation can be abused. I should like to know whether there is any precedent for this kind of thing. You can pass retroactive legislation, yes, which, for example, may be a bill of indemnity retroactively letting somebody off the hook for an illegal act which he has inadvertently committed, and everybody agrees, “Yes, it was pure inadvertence, no ill intent,” and that sort of thing. But where you get a situation where the law says, “this shall be done,” and your retroactive legislation may not come into effect for goodness knows how long, that is a different matter. If this bill, whatever its number is—I have forgotten—had come into effect, let us say, on the 10th January, or something like that, nobody would have made much of a dust-up about it; but it is highly probable now that it will not come into effect until away on in this year, and perhaps not until next year. The pressure upon parliamentary time may be too great. I would very much like to have, from those glorious and immortal people in the Department of Justice, a precedent that would really be on all fours with this. I suspect that even their ingenuity will be taxed to find any such precedent.

Senator Perrault: The diligent search will continue for the precedents requested by the honourable senator.

I think it should be noted that however interesting the historical origins of the periodicals described in such glowing terms by the honourable senator may be, and however well they may have served the nation, the irrefutable fact is that after many, many years in operation the total combined circulation of the two publications at the time they were suspended amounted to something like 3,500 copies a month for a population of 23 million Canadians. This suggests somewhat less than lively interest in these publications on the part of citizens across the nation. Indeed, Canadian taxpayers were asked to subsidize each subscription to the extent of $50 a year. Obviously, if the marketplace is to be regarded as any criterion of public opinion or public taste, the Labour Gazette and La Gazette du travail were not as successful as their founders may have hoped.

THE ECONOMY

CANADIAN BALANCE OF PAYMENTS—QUESTION

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question about Canada's balance of payments picture? It was recently announced that for the month of January there was a trade surplus of, I think, $386 million. I wonder if the honourable leader could inform the house what the present net position is in our balance of payments account, and also whether the deficit is still increasing or stabilizing.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: That question will be taken as notice, because the current information is not on my desk at this time; however, I think Canadians, regardless of party affiliations, can take enormous heart from the great improvement in the merchandise trade balance. There continues to be a negative influence arising from the fact that thousands of Canadians are doing sufficiently well from an income standpoint to be able to take extended vacations abroad, spending money on travel and touring in other countries. The figures requested by the honourable senator will be sought this afternoon. I hope a current picture can be presented tomorrow.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGENCY—SUPPLY OF OIL IN ATLANTIC CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to thank my honourable friend the Leader of the Government for his reply about the International Energy Association material that I asked for. I confirm to him that I would be pleased to receive copies of the three instruments about which he spoke.

● (1430)

I should like to ask a supplementary question about the supply of oil in Atlantic Canada. He informed the house that this matter was not subject to public control in that the strategic reserve, if there were any, was held in private hands. Has the government any input into the quantity of oil that is deemed advisable to be held in this reserve, and, whether it has or has not, is the government satisfied with the amount that is held in that manner.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Frith moved the third reading of Bill C-2, to amend the Health Resources Fund Act.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I was wondering, considering the ruling of Madam Speaker, if it were Senator Frith's intention, or that of the Chairman of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, to move concurrence of the Senate in the recommendation made in the report of the committee, which is in addition to the committee's saying that the bill is returned without amendment. If so, would it not be more proper to have that motion before the motion for third reading?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to move such a motion. My motion is for the third reading of Bill C-2.

Senator Langlois: Speaking to the point of order—

Senator Flynn: He said no.

Senator Langlois: Speaking to the point of order, I would like to inform the Senate that it is my intention, after third reading, to move that the recommendation of the committee be included in the message sent to the House of Commons with Bill C-2.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bird, that this bill be now read a third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Flynn: No, it should not be so easy.

Honourable senators, this is a quite curious and serious situation. Discussion took place in committee and in this chamber last night concerning the objections of the Government of British Columbia. The information we have from the chairman of the committee is that the committee decided that it would not hear any representations from provincial governments about this unilateral decision of the federal government. It seems to me, in the context of the criticism recently levelled against the Senate by the present government and by many other people to the effect that we are not looking after regional interests, that it is quite a serious matter for a committee to refuse to hear objections by a provincial government.

It has been said by the sponsor of the bill and also by others that this is strictly federal legislation; that it is not an agreement between the two levels of government and that therefore the federal government is quite justified in altering the law unilaterally, without consultation. It seems to me that this is entirely wrong. Here is a proposal made to the provinces by the federal government, endorsed by Parliament, to contribute a certain amount in a certain way to some medical projects in the provinces, and that proposal was accepted by the provinces under the conditions laid down in the legislation. It is just as if I said to someone, "I offer to pay you $100 a year." If that person agrees to accept it, then I am bound to do that. It is a contract; you do not need a formal agreement under these conditions.

This is the equivalent of a bilateral agreement, because there was an offer which was accepted. Let no one try to make me believe that there is any validity in the argument of Senator Frith that this is purely federal legislation in which the provinces have no say.

Last night Senator Bonnell said that the committee did not invite the provinces to appear because he knew they would object to the passage of the bill. Of course they would object, but at least the committee could have heard them to find out what kind of representations they wished to make. If you decide in advance that you are going to say no, it is to say the least contrary to the well-known rule of audi alteram partem.

I am seeking support for this position from Senator Goldenberg. I think the Supreme Court of Canada and all our courts have ruled that at least you should give someone who has something to say the right to be heard. This is a denial of that elementary right.

It seems to me that in the circumstances the committee did not act wisely in refusing to hear the representations of the Province of British Columbia, especially when it was clearly established in committee that the specific concern of that province arises out of a mere technical problem. First, the minister refused to accept the application because the application form itself was not signed. However, there was a complaint by letter which was signed, and the application that was signed later to correct, if you like, the technical omission in the first instance, arrived too late because of the mail strike. I have never heard of such harsh justice being meted out on the basis of a mere technical difficulty. In our courts today nobody would dare raise an objection like that in order to refuse someone a right.

In my opinion, we should do something about it. I think we are fully aware of the facts, but if we want to know more about the facts I believe the Government of British Columbia should be invited to appear before the committee.

I move, therefore, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart:

That this bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for further consideration of the request by the Government of British Columbia to appear before it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bird, that this bill be now read a third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart:

That this bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for further consideration of the request by the Government of British Columbia to appear before it.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

• (1440)

Senator Bonnell: In speaking to the amendment, honourable senators, let me say that the committee was very pleased and honoured to have a telex from British Columbia ministers, the Honourable R. H. McClelland, Minister of Health, and the Honourable Patrick McGeer, Minister of Education, Science and Technology. It says:

We would ask, therefore, before the Senate of Canada gives consent to the passage of this ill-timed legislation, that we be allowed to present our government's argument to your committee.

At the first meeting of our committee the motion was made to invite British Columbia. The motion was withdrawn. Senator Bell put forward British Columbia's arguments very strongly and we had copies of their submissions. It was felt that before we decided to invite them, we should hear what the Government of Canada had to say concerning some of those unsigned and signed applications, dates, and so forth.

The motion to invite British Columbia was withdrawn in order to get the information from the minister. When the minister sent the information to our committee, we found that most things said by the Province of British Columbia were true, and we also found that all of the things said by the minister were true. The problem was that the dates upon which these things took place were different. In other words, applications sent by the Province of British Columbia, signed on a certain date, did not reach the department on the date that they were sent, and the cut-off date of November 4 was reached and passed between the dates they were sent and the dates they arrived. Under Bill C-2 the minister had no authority to approve anything after that date. The applications did not arrive on time.

Senator Flynn: The bill is not law yet.

Senator Bonnell: It had not become law yet, but with regard to the proposed Bill C-2 before us—

Senator Flynn: How stupid can you be?

Senator Bonnell: The committee also heard that there was a restraint program.

Senator Flynn: Oh, well, that's better.

Senator Bonnell: A restraint program had been put forward by the Treasury Board of the Government of Canada. I think that most members of the committee thought that the minister wanted to extend the program to give British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec more funds, but because of the restraint program—and the first ministers had agreed to restraint—the Treasury Board had come forward with the recommendation of September 8 indicating that these projects should be cut.

Most of us felt, rightly or wrongly, that because the Government of Canada was trying to enforce a restraint program, we had no power to ask for more expenditure of money. We felt that we were on the fringe of whether we had power to amend the bill. We did what we thought was fairest for everybody. We supported the bill to uphold the policy of restraint agreed to by the first ministers. But we realized that British Columbia had a project in the works, and we wanted to encourage it and we wanted to let British Columbia know that the Senate, as a whole, was sympathetic to British Columbia. We did not want to mention just British Columbia because other provinces as well had projects in the works. We wanted to show our sympathy to all the regions of Canada, so instead of "provinces" we said "projects". We recommended that sympathetic consideration be given to the claims of British Columbia and to the claims of any of the other provinces whose projects were in the works on this cut-off date.

I want to assure honourable senators that the committee was sympathetic to British Columbia but we did not see that there was anything we could add. British Columbia had already convinced us that they had a beautiful hospital to be considered, but, at the same time, they did not meet the deadline of November 4. Therefore, we felt we had to make the recommendation that the government consider these projects later on.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Therefore, honourable senators, I suggest we should reject the amendment, and agree to the third reading of the bill.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, there are a few things I should like to say with respect to this matter. They are primarily, but not entirely, directed toward the point that the committee refused a request from a province to be heard on a matter which was in dispute—so far as facts go, at any rate—between the representatives of the Government of Canada and the representatives of the Government of British Columbia. The committee had before it a telex in which those representatives of British Columbia specifically asked to be heard, as the chairman has said.

Let me just remind honourable senators of the committee chairman's response last evening when I asked the question as to whether these people were heard, and what the reasons were if they were not. I refer to page 677 of Debates of the Senate. In response to my question it will be seen that he said:

Honourable senators, the main reason behind the decision of the committee was the fact that Bill C-2 involved an amendment to a federal statute.

What other kind of statute would we be dealing with I wonder, if it were not a federal statute? Would we be dealing with a provincial statute? Would we have to wait until we were dealing with a statute of British Columbia before representatives of British Columbia could come here? With all courtesy toward the chairman and the committee, I find such a statement not only completely without merit but also completely without reason. On that basis we would never consider any legislation because we never get any legislation except federal legislation or amendments to federal statutes.

Then he went on to say:

—The Health Resources Fund Act was not the subject of a federal-provincial agreement. The purpose of Bill C-2 was to terminate the Health Resources Fund a year and some months ahead of its original expiry date, and certainly in light of that it was felt by the committee that every province would probably object to its passage. It was the feeling that we had nothing further to learn from the provinces. We had received a brief from one province outlining their objection and we had the response of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

● (1450)

How familiar a ring this sentence has, and how well the chairman has learned to write it having heard it so many times himself from the ministers of this government—"... we had nothing further to learn from the provinces."

I sat on two committees of the Senate that dealt with the Constitution, and I can't tell you how many people came before those committees to point out to us that one of the things expected of the Senate was that it would represent the interests of the provinces and regions of this country. We had nothing further to learn from the provinces! Wouldn't that make a great song and dance to give to the provinces at a federal-provincial conference—we had nothing further to learn from the provinces. And listen to this:

We had received a brief from one province outlining their objection and we had the response of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

They had the response of the Minister of National Health and Welfare before them in person.

I have something to learn from the provinces every day, and even Senator Bonnell may have something to learn. Senator Lamontagne has learned a great deal from the provinces in the past and will continue to do so in the future. We are denying a request from ministers of another government to be heard in person. We are not only denying them, but denying them without the courtesy of a reply. I say that because it is but a few moments ago that I asked if the committee replied to their request, and the chairman said the committee did not.

Some honourable senators not long ago heard representatives from the Government of British Columbia say of the Senate that it has ceased to serve any useful purpose from the point of view of the provinces, if it ever did. They made that representation to the Senate committee or the joint committee—or perhaps to both. They said that the Senate was useless from the point of view of the provinces, and that they wanted to substitute for it some other body appointed in a different way with different people and representing different interests.

I cannot think of anything that would more likely reinforce them in their point of view that they were right than the denial of this committee to hear their reasons for feeling that this bill ought to be changed, and then failing to give them an answer to their request.

It grieves me deeply that a committee of the Senate should allow itself to be put in that position, because not only do the members of the committee have to bear the burden of the blame for that kind of action, but so does the Senate and every member of it. The Senate and its members must bear the burden of blame for having refused a request from the government of a province of Canada that its ministers be allowed personally to present its views about proposed legislation to a committee of the Senate to which the legislation was referred.

Honourable senators, I support the motion in amendment of the Leader of the Opposition. I cannot find anything in the explanation given by the distinguished, able and friendly chairman of the committee to support his views. I simply feel that somehow or another justice went astray, and that the committee itself should be alert and quick to remedy that failure of justice to make sure that the representatives of the Province of British Columbia be allowed to put their case to a committee of the Senate before this bill is dealt with on third reading.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, after listening with sympathetic attention—and I stress that adjective—to the explanations that have been offered to us, both last evening and today, by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, I must confess to you that I think we have made a mistake, and it will be the part of wisdom to rectify that mistake as quickly and graciously as we can. Our mistake, of course, is our failure to respond constructively and affirmatively to a request from ministers of the Government of British Columbia to be heard by the Senate committee on matters which affect them.

I have had an opportunity to look at some of the proceedings of the committee. Although I am not myself a member of the committee, I make no excuse for not being present at the meetings. As is the case with many other senators, I have more than one committee to which I devote my attention, and it is impossible to fit in everything when there are several committees sitting at the same time. While the chairman of the committee reproached me in a friendly way last evening for not having been present, I must tell him now that he should not have expected me to be present, and must not expect me to be present in the future, because I am not a member of that committee. By the same token, he must not expect me to not read what took place.

I have been able to obtain a typewritten copy of the committee's proceedings on March 5. That was not the last meeting of the committee, but it was of interest to me to read that Senator Inman raised the matter by stating:

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Minister of Health and Welfare from British Columbia would like to appear before this committee. Can I make a motion to that effect?

No reply was given to that request, but the chairman intervened instead to suggest that the committee clerk read a telegram that was sent to him by the Minister of Health and the Minister of Education, Science and Technology at Victoria, British Columbia, the gist of it being that they would like to appear before the committee. Copies of that telegram were sent, I notice, to a number of senators—I suppose to all those who are listed as members of the committee.

Senator Flynn: Was it sent to those senators from British Columbia as well?

Senator Roblin: Yes, because I see their names on the list—I see the names of Senators Austin, Bell, Lawson, van Roggen and Williams.

Senator Flynn: Was it sent to Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government in the Senate?

Senator Roblin: Yes, his name is here too. It is difficult to give the date, because it simply says March 1979. It does not give the exact date, so I am unable to tell you about that.

In any event, the subject was discussed in a general way by the committee until Senator Thompson suggested that the matter be deferred until the committee heard from the minister. He was prepared to move an amendment to that effect. He stated:

We are simply deferring moving on this question of inviting the ministers until such time as we are able to look at the material which the minister is going to bring back in answer to Senator Bell's question.

● (1500)

As I say, it is a cliff-hanger. I do not know what happened after that. Obviously, no motions were put nor were any amendments made. Proposals to do so appear in the record, but they were certainly not put to the committee. I take it that these were suggestions indicating the train of thought of those who were in attendance.

What happened the next day, I do not know. Whether the motions were actually moved and seconded or whether the matter was ever referred to again, I do not know. It may be that it was considered and thought, after some reflection, that it was not necessary to hear the provincial ministers. I will have to wait until the committee proceedings of that date are produced before I will be in a position to form any judgment in that respect. I take it that no steps were taken to invite the ministers, and that is really the point.

In making that decision—and I say this with regret, because we all have to share in it—it was a mistake not to ask the provincial ministers to appear before the committee. I think we should now take advantage of the opportunity to rectify that mistake in the most effective manner we know.

In the course of the argument that Senator Bonnell expressed to us, some confusion arose as to when documents were mailed from Victoria to Ottawa and whether or not the postal services failed to deliver when they should have. I do not know about the state of the postal service between Victoria and Ottawa, but I suspect that the government in Victoria is very concerned about the state of the postal service from Ottawa to Victoria, because although they had written to the minister and sent telegrams on October 25, and wrote again on January 15 and February 16, they received no reply. Even when they took the last resort open to them and sent a telex to the Senate, which, while not being the center of power in our political system, apparently was the court of last resort in this instance, they did not get a reply from us. They must be very discouraged about the state of public communication in the Dominion of Canada.

I also would be rather surprised, if we let this matter stand the way it is, that they would ever again ask to appear before a committee of the Senate. I know that if I as a member of a provincial government had been snubbed in this way—not even a reply from the Senate—I certainly would not appreciate it. What the ministers on the other side may do is entirely up to them, but for the Senate not even to reply to a minister of the Crown of a provincial government is a snub that would certainly not be appreciated. Should they be willing to appear before a committee of the Senate in the future, I for one would be appreciative of their spirit of good citizenship in being willing to overlook the injustice and the slight that we extended to them in the manner in which we have dealt with this situation.

I do not like to stress this matter—it is unpleasant to do so—but we have, not only in the words of the chairman of the committee last night, but also in some of the expressions of opinion given by the sponsor of Bill C-2 in the Senate, the impression that it really does not matter whether we hear these people or not on the bill. We are told that we have the minister's exposition of the affair. Well and good. That is a proper thing to do. But surely it is a good thing to hear the other side of the question. My experience in public life has taught me that there usually are two sides to a question. There is one side I may not think much of, but there are two sides, and to proceed in this manner, apparently satisfied to hear only one side of the question when the other side is ready, willing and able to come and tell us what they think, seems to me to be an unfortunate course indeed to have followed.

We know the provinces are going to object to cutting programs in which they are involved, but surely that does not mean that they should be deprived of the right to make their objections heard in a forum such as this.

We have heard, for example, that it is necessary to proceed with this measure because of fiscal restraints. We need to save money and to balance the budget. God knows those are all worthy aims, but yet we get the argument that while we are going to save money by terminating this fund, there will be something in the resolutions that will reinstate these expenditures later on.

What a self-defeating performance that is! If that is presented to us as justification for not consulting the provinces, I for one certainly fail to see it. On the one hand, we are told we have to make these cuts because we are out of money, while on the other we are told, "Well, never mind, after we cut them we will see if we can't restore a few to make you feel better about it."

To my mind, that is not policy. That is expediency of the most glaring and obvious sort, and I certainly do not think it is any argument to be advanced for the action that the committee took in respect of this bill.

My colleague Senator Smith (Colchester) dealt with the concept that a provincial government has no right to speak on a federal statute. That is a doctrine that is entirely novel to the Canadian Constitution, and I suspect it will get the attention it deserves. We cannot really accept the idea that because people do not like the bill, we should not hear them, and we cannot accept the idea that because we have heard from the minister, we have nothing to learn from anyone else. None of those ideas fit any kind of federal system that I have ever heard of.

But I think we could overlook all of those things, because in the heat of debate in this house we all say things we would not like to have to write out 100 times as an exercise in good behaviour afterwards. In the pressure of debate in the house, when responding to questions and in the heat of debate, we sometimes say things we wish we had not said, or that we wish we had said in a different form because they do not convey our exact feelings. As far as the statement of the chairman of the committee is concerned, I certainly sympathize with the situation in which he found himself. But that does not mean that we should not do something about the problem with which we are faced, and I think it is particularly important that we do so in this instance.

As my honourable colleague said a little while ago, the Province of British Columbia has had a thing or two to say about the Senate of Canada. Any of you who have taken the trouble to read the constitutional proposals of British Columbia will be aware of exactly what they think about us.

Perhaps it would be a good thing to register their opinion on the operations of the Senate of Canada. The document "British Columbia's Constitutional Proposals, Paper No. 3, Reform of the Canadian Senate" contains an extended discussion on the origin of the Senate. The authors make quite a point of quoting from a number of authorities for the proposition that the function of the Senate as a protector of sectional and regional interests in the federal Parliament was laid down as one of the reasons why we are in existence at all. After reading these various authorities, they summarize their opinion, and I quote the words of the report:

These then were the three reasons for creation of the Senate—protection of the propertied minority, review of Commons legislation, and most importantly—

And I have mentally underlined that phrase.

—most importantly, representation of provincial interest in the national policy-making process.

Then they go on to ask a very interesting question, and again I quote:

The question now becomes: How effective has the Senate been in performing these three functions?

If any honourable senator cares to follow the tenor of their argument through the rest of the brief, it becomes obvious that they don't think it has been very good with respect to protection of provincial rights. In fact, in respect of the reformed Senate they say:

The primary purpose of the Senate—its raison d'être—should be to provide a forum for the articulation and representation of provincial or regional interests in the national law-making process.

I think we all agree with that. Reformed or unreformed, I think we would all agree that that is part of our job here, and we would all agree that, in these times in particular, when this house is under some scrutiny on the part of the public and some scrutiny on the part of the Province of British Columbia, this particular aspect of our responsibilities is important.

I suggest to you that the cabinet of British Columbia will be making the point now that their criticisms of this body have been proven to the hilt. If they ever needed any evidence to produce to the people of their province that we do not pay any attention to their regional interests, they certainly got it with the performance of this committee the other day. If they are looking for support for a reformed Senate, which will probably change the structure of this body beyond recognition, they certainly have added weight to add to the evidence they have already presented. For that reason, what transpired in respect of this measure is unfortunate.

I am not willing to make personal capital out of this matter. I am more interested in seeing that we recognize that we have made a mistake and that we ought to do something to remedy it right away. I recommend that course for the Senate. It may be that if the motion in amendment is adopted and we have an opportunity of hearing from the representatives of the Province of British Columbia, it may change nothing. I am not saying it will change anything. It may be that the situation will remain as it is. But that is not the point. The point is that they deserve their day in court. The point is that a government of a province has done something which is rather rare; that is, requested to appear before a committee of the Senate of Canada.

I know that in my term as Premier of Manitoba that never happened, and I suspect that after this experience it may happen rather less frequently in the future. Here we have a request to be heard by a provincial government and it has been turned down. If we accept the motion in amendment, we will give ourselves another chance. There is no need to have recriminations. There is no need to try to apportion blame. We all have to take our share of the blame. There is no need to try to make it awkward for anyone in particular. We simply have to say that for reasons which seemed good at the time, and which we now recognize were questionable, we ought to reverse ourselves; we ought to let this committee get going again and we ought to let it have an opportunity to invite these gentlemen to come down so that at least they will have their day in court and they will know that this branch of the federal system is anxious to do what it can to have representations before it from the regions, and where it thinks that regional rights are affected that it will render judgment one way or the other.

So I suggest to honourable senators that we look at this matter in the most constructive way that we can, and that seems to me to indicate that we should support the amendment.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have listened with interest to the comments made by the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators who have demonstrated a great concern about this issue. I have listened with particular attention, because of my own complete personal support for an extension of hospital facilities to help the children of my home province. I cannot accept the view, however, that somehow a callous and heartless government and an equally callous and heartless committee are denying the legitimate right of a province of Canada to be heard in Parliament. I can tell you, honourable senators, that there are few issues in the past year which has drawn upon more of the time of the ministers and members representing the province of British Columbia than this particular issue. The fault, very frankly, does not lie at the doorstep of the federal government. If there is any fault—and it may be inadvertent—I believe it lies at the doorstep of the provincial government. I say this at a time when relations between the Province of British Columbia and the federal government are perhaps better than they have ever been before.

I want to give you a general chronology of the situation so that honourable senators can appreciate the concern felt by the Government of Canada with respect to the matter. If this project had been submitted for approval within the legal time framework, the established time framework, there is no question at all that this project would have received the kind of generous funding that it deserves—the kind that I hope can be acquired from some alternative source, perhaps involving a re-allocation of certain provincial revenues, and federal assistance in some other direction. But as one who advocated in the most forceful fashion possible that this project be accommodated, if possible, by the Government of Canada, I must say that a diligent study of the record indicates that the project was not submitted within the established time frame. The record indicates that, and no committee—and I regret saying this very much—no committee meeting is going to change the basic fact that this project arrived in its official authorized form well after the deadline. If we were to make an exception, what would we say to the other provinces who have not had their full allocation of federal dollars.

Senator Flynn: There are no others.

Senator Perrault: There are others, honourable senators, because a number of provinces have had only 85 per cent of their budget allocation. Do we say that because we are creating a precedent for one province, the province which I happen to love with a special fervour, that the others should be accommodated as well? I want to remind honourable senators that in February 1978, the first ministers, in a rare example of unanimity, agreed that increases in budget expenditures should be kept below the gross national product, and they agreed that spending restraint was needed and that cuts would be necessary in certain federal and provincial programs. It was obvious that restraints would be felt by the people of Canada in various regions and by taxpayers everywhere. That is a matter of common sense.

Would it not have been logical for all provinces following that February 1978 meeting to have said, "Let us arrange our priorities so that we can submit immediately those projects for which we can apply for federal government assistance?" That was in February 1978. And now we are told by one honourable senator that if we do not give this province a hearing, there might be some form of retaliatory action taken by the province, because don't we all recall that they wanted to convert this place into a Bundesrat? The question is not whether or not the Province of British Columbia or any other province wants to make the Senate a counterpart of the West German upper house or anything else. The question is: What are the facts? That is the basis on which we should make our judgment in this place.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Who decides what the facts are?

Senator Perrault: The facts I cited earlier are a matter of record, an extensive record. May I suggest that perhaps more of these facts should be put on the record.

The First Ministers' Conference was held in February 1978 when agreements were made with the provinces that there would have to be cutbacks in many programs, including joint costing programs. There was a meeting held in June in British Columbia when the Honourable Monique Bégin went out and spoke to the medical research community—I understand that there were provincial government people there—and the medical research community was told that if there were to be cuts—and it was in the air; everybody could see they were coming—then surely the Health Resources Fund would be a natural prime candidate for such cuts. The minister went out to British Columbia to deliver that message. She told them that if they wanted to have money for particular projects—and this is a matter of record—they should send them to the minister as soon as possible. Not one word was heard about this hospital.

In September the minister telexed the Honourable Robert McClelland in British Columbia, but had no reply. On either November the 16th or 19th, long after the amendment had been approved by the House of Commons, the minister said that a signed submission was received for that hospital, which is now described as being of urgent necessity on the west coast. So I ask you, where does the responsibility lie here?

When the need for budget restraints was agreed on in February 1978, I find it frankly and personally appalling that a vital submission of this kind could not have been sent in within a reasonable time. I would like to inform honourable senators that the Province of British Columbia some of whose representatives have stated that they would like to improve B.C.'s representation in Parliament, including this place, did not bother testing the quality of that representation until it was too late. There is no record of any correspondence from British Columbia to the federal ministers representing the Province of British Columbia or the federal members of Parliament from British Columbia urging their support for a written application for help. Can any honourable senator imagine a province, with a strike-bound post office, mailing a signed application for assistance for a badly needed medical facility? Remember, this was during a mail strike. No information was communicated to B.C.'s government members of Parliament or the cabinet members from British Columbia. There was no suggestion that British Columbia felt this to be an urgent matter that deserved immediate attention.

Would it not have been logical for the Minister of Education—and I count him among my friends—to have provided the ministers of British Columbia with a copy of that letter and say, "You travel down there every weekend. Would you take this down and raise it as a vital and urgent matter?" No such letter. At the least, it was an unfortunate lack of communication with certain people who are the legitimate representatives—at least until the system is changed, if it is ever going to be changed—of British Columbia.

Now we are portrayed here today as a callous government, a government not interested in talking to the provinces. But we are fully willing to meet with any province on any occasion which warrants it. Indeed, through my office a few weeks ago a meeting was arranged between the Honourable the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Education in the Province of British Columbia. I personally was pleased to make arrangements for that meeting. After that session, the federal minister reviewed every possible way of attempting to get money for that hospital—every possible way.

I would ask our friends on the other side, who remind us so often about the rule of law and how legality in all things is a principle of fundamental importance—and we all agree on that matter—I ask, when the facts are as they exist, what is a committee going to do?

Senator Flynn: That is a technicality.

Senator Perrault: What is a committee supposed to do?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Be fair.

Senator Walker: Bring in equity.

Senator Perrault: What is a committee to do?

Senator Smith (Colchester): Hear them.

Senator Flynn: Technicality and legality are two different things.

Senator Grosart: Listen to them.

Senator Perrault: I can find in the record—and I ask honourable senators to examine that same record—

Senator Smith (Colchester): I have!

Senator Perrault: There is nothing in the record, unfortunately, to support a technical reversal of the decision made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Fairness does.

Senator Perrault: I have had a number of useful conversations with representatives of the Province of British Columbia regarding the matter. I have suggested to them the possibility of having certain provincial funds re-directed to that children's hospital—and I have suggested that some of us will attempt to find alternative ways to bring federal money to bear on certain other medical needs in the province of British Columbia. The problem of the Children's Hospital is not being ignored. Active solutions are being sought.

The fact is—and I regret to say this perhaps more than anyone after developing a great file of correspondence on the subject and making personal submissions at a number of levels—the facts seem to indicate that the Province of British Columbia was dilatory. In my view it may not have been seized with the urgency of the cutback program. In any case, B.C. did not get its application in by the required date. There is no question about that. Certain of their spokesmen have said, "Well, it is because of that federal mail strike that it did not get there on time." That is no legitimate excuse. I question whether that excuse is accepted by the National Revenue Department or by other government departments.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is a poor test.

Senator Flynn: It is accepted by them. They are not as stupid as that.

Senator Perrault: Well, in terms of most activities with respect to the courts, the onus is on the individual to meet the deadlines, and the honourable senator is aware of that fact.

To say now that the mail delivery system is the reason the application did not go forward really does not possess much validity. I regret it as much as anyone, but the fact is the application did not get there on time. Yet, we are working to try to find alternative routes to meet that particular problem.

Senator Bell: May I ask the honourable leader a question? I am wondering about the submission's not getting there on time. Is Bill C-2, with the date changed, now the law?

Senator Perrault: The government has to provide a cut-off date for any program termination of this kind. Obviously, a date must be set and the provinces must be informed of certain cut-off limitations. There is not one province in Canada that does not want to get its full 100 per cent of any program. So under these circumstances, a cut-off date had to be established. It was inevitable. It had to be done.

Senator Grosart: Is it legal?

Senator Perrault: It has been done by many governments in the past.

Senator Grosart: Is it legal before the act is passed?

Senator Perrault: Of course it is supportable.

Senator Grosart: Is it legal?

Senator Lamontagne: It is legal for us to change it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have set forth the facts as well as I have been able to establish them and I must express my deepest personal hurt and concern about the fact that my province failed to get its application in on time; but if we say that deadlines mean nothing then that means that the restraint program savings to the Canadian taxpayer, which could amount to $60 million, may be completely negated.

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Perrault: And the cutback—

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Perrault: And the cutback will be meaningless.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Not at all!

Senator Perrault: The cutback will be meaningless, if not to the total extent of $60 million, at least to the extent of part of it.

Senator Flynn: Or part of it. May I put a question to the Leader of the Government? He says he is trying to find a legal way—

Senator Bonnell: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Flynn: No, I am not closing the debate. I said I was asking a question.

The Leader of the Government says he can't find any legal way. Does he know that the first reading of the bill provided a cut-off date of September 8, which was then postponed to November 4. What difference would it make if it were postponed to a few days later in order to qualify this application which was merely received late because a formality was overlooked in the first application?

Senator Perrault: The honourable leader talks in terms of a mere formality. If I had been a provincial minister and had been concerned about the urgency of this project I would not have waited until November, after being informed in February of 1978 that I was facing urgent cutbacks in the budget.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you answer my question? Give me a reply. You never reply to the question that is asked.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That is because there is no answer.

Senator Frith: In considering the amendment I know honourable senators would want to know that they had all of the facts on the particular issue that have been emphasized by those supporting the amendment. I am referring to the implication that the committee heard only one side of the story.

I can understand Senator Roblin's coming to that conclusion. I suppose there is a good chance that the Leader of the Opposition, who was present on the second day when the other side was heard, will correct Senator Roblin. But just in case he does not—and forgiving Senator Roblin for his views because, as he pointed out, he saw what happened on the first day only; he saw what happened when the committee heard the minister—let me ask what happened on the second day, when his leader was present.

Senator Flynn: I was present for part of it only.

Senator Frith: Yes, the opposition leader was present for only part of the meeting—he is quite correct—because after hearing the other side of the story he left. That other side was presented by the senator representing provincial interests. A senator duly appointed for British Columbia presented the other side, and that was our colleague Senator Nancy Bell. She presented it articulately and eloquently, having laid the groundwork for doing so on the first day, as Senator Roblin may have noticed, by posing a great number of questions and insisting on the filing of a great number of documents. She was quite proper in so insisting, for the reason that she should, being a good senator, represent the provincial interests in exactly the way the Province of British Columbia wants them represented. She said, "I want to hear the other side of this story. I now ask you, Madam Minister, to please file all the following documents so that we can see the other side of the story."

This is the Senate functioning in the way it should function according to the Province of British Columbia and also according, I think, to the way we think it should function, namely, having a representative from British Columbia put forward the interests of that province. Senator Bell did so, and did it well.

As a result of that, we saw the other side of the story in detail. In fact, we devoted the second meeting—and it was just as long as the first one if not longer—to examining the whole evidence submitted as to what actually transpired. We saw the telegrams, a submission, a brief submitted by the minister from British Columbia and supported by the senator representing them, plus all the correspondence.

Senator Flynn: One of their representatives.

Senator Frith: Plus copies of the applications, plus questions from Senator Thompson clarifying and asking further questions of the departmental representative, and questions from Senator Bell.

[Senator Perrault.]

Now we come to when, as has already been pointed out, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition left. Well, when he left it was because he had made a suggestion, which everyone supported, that perhaps we could add a recommendation. This seemed the best way to handle the matter. At that point, everyone agreed with the Leader of the Opposition that it would be a good idea to have some kind of recommendation.

● (1530)

Senator Flynn: Agreed. What is wrong with that?

Senator Frith: There is nothing wrong with that at all. The only thing that is wrong is to stand here today and, with innocent blue eyes, suggest that we never heard the other side of the story.

Senator Smith (Colchester): You never did, and you know it.

Senator Frith: With respect, I believe I am qualified to say whether we heard the other side, because I was there and Senator Smith was not.

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order. I never said what the honourable senator suggested I said. I said that the British Columbia minister should have been heard. I did not say that we heard only one part of the story.

Senator Frith: I said that I thought perhaps that you might correct Senator Roblin. His are the blue eyes I was referring to.

Senator Flynn: I have green eyes, but sometimes they look blue.

Senator Frith: If the eyes fit, wear them.

Senator Roblin: I would just like to point out that there is no green in my eye, so I am not taken in by the honourable senator's eloquence.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the essential point, in reaching a conclusion on this amendment, is that we should all realize that the other side was fully heard. It was well represented, exactly as it should have been represented, by the senator from British Columbia, who had been asked by the other side to represent their interests. That is on the first point.

On the question of whether the amendment—or should I say the non-amendment—

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I would like to say that I was not asked by the Province of British Columbia, or any member thereof, to represent their interests.

Senator Frith: Then I am bound to say that the honourable senator's able representation of British Columbia's interests was apparently unaffected by whether or not she was asked, and therefore she is entitled to even more credit because she looked after the interests of her province even though they did not ask her to do so. I guarantee to honourable senators that she did it, and did it well.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Frith: If it is in order, yes.

Senator Grosart: I rose, expecting the honourable senator to resume his seat when I did so. I rose merely to ask whether he would permit a question.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Grosart: Is the honourable senator prepared to withdraw the statement, which he has just made, that Senator Bell was briefed by the Government of British Columbia?

Senator Perrault: He did not say that.

Senator Frith: Senator Bell can correct me if I am wrong. We had before us a brief, or a submission, signed by a Dr. McGeer. As I recall it, Senator Bell presented that to us. If that is wrong, I stand corrected. In any event, the brief was there, and the impression a number of us had was that the brief was being presented by Senator Bell.

Senator Perrault: You believed it was an official B.C. brief?

Senator Frith: That is with reference to the audi alteram partem argument—that the other side was not heard. It was fully heard.

The next question is whether or not the recommendation, in effect, wipes out the main part of the report, that the bill be reported without amendment.

The recommendation arose in precisely the way I suggested it did. Everyone felt, with regard to the question concerning hospitals in British Columbia—and honourable senators will recall that I mentioned this when speaking to the bill on second reading—that it was the only application for a project of some size and importance that was not received in time. On the second day, when we heard the other side, we were advised, as was mentioned by the Leader of the Government, that a draft application had been sent and comments had been sent back. The application had not arrived in time, and it was a question of whether or not there should be a further amendment to the bill. That did not occur in the other place. The government did not see fit to do that, but passed it on to us in the other form.

With respect, what the committee did—partly on the urging, and certainly with the support, of the Leader of the Opposition—was to solve the problem that arose on the second day when we heard the other side by suggesting a recommendation that some alternative method be found that would not open up the fund to all of the other provinces.

I have already referred to British Columbia's opinion of the Senate. In contradiction of their somewhat contemptuous comments about the work of this Senate, if they will study the record and see what their senator did in this case, they will find that the Senate committee operated then as does the Senate now—in spades, as they say—and performed exactly the function they wanted it to perform, through their representative in the Senate.

Of course, it is possible to continue a discussion of the cutoff date forever, just as in the case of a budget. A budget is brought in, and says what, as of a certain date, the excise tax shall be. At some point we then have to pass a bill to establish that particular date in law.

The decision was made in this case. The evidence before the committee was that it was made well in advance. People were advised, although not formally so until the September 8 telex. The committee heard evidence that the minister herself had been in British Columbia in August and had told them that if they had any projects they had better get them going, because cuts were anticipated and these were the kinds of program that might very well be cut.

The committee heard all of the evidence. I underline that, because the basic tenor of the amendment is criticism of the work of the committee. It is based on the assumption that the committee made a mistake and that it should correct that mistake. It is my respectful submission that no such mistake was made.

With reference to the reply to the telegram emphasized by Senator Smith, those who were present at the committee meeting will recall that the chairman was asked by the committee, "What are you going to do in reply to the letter"? The chairman then suggested that he answer their letter and send them a copy of the report. Of course, he would not want to send a copy of the report until the Senate had passed the legislation. He could then send them the report on the basis of what actually transpired in both the committee and the Senate.

That, in turn, was a corollary to the whole discussion, participated in by the Leader of the Opposition, and resulting in the decision that the bill should be reported without amendment and that a recommendation should go forward to the minister from the chairman of the committee—not from the Senate, although that is up to the Senate to decide—asking if there were any alternative ways to support projects she felt had been unreasonably cut off because of the need to set a specific date.

● (1540)

For all those reasons, honourable senators, it seems to me we must decide that the amendment should not carry, bearing, as it does, a totally unfounded criticism of the committee. The committee should, in my view, for all the reasons suggested, be complimented, not criticized.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I feel I should say a few words at this point, though not with the idea of criticizing either the work of the committee or the decision that the committee made. My presumption is that it would not have made the slightest bit of difference to the ultimate decision if the people from British Columbia had come.

I am a member of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution, and for the last three or four months we have been talking about this very problem of regional input. We have been asking how we can make it easier for the provinces to make some kind of input when there is a bill before a Senate Committee that they are particularly interested in. I personally have taken a leading part, as the members of the committee who are here will remember, in pushing the concept that any time any committee of this Senate is considering any legislation whatever that might affect the provinces in any special way, they should automatically be informed and should be asked whether they want to make representations before the committee.

I recall that a few weeks ago we had a perfect example of this in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in connection with the referendum bill. I do not think I am breaching any confidences when I say that that is one bill which surely can affect all the provinces, and not just Quebec, since one of the ways in which it can be used is to vault over the heads of a provincial government and appeal directly to the people.

There was a reluctance on the part of the committee to do what I had been pressing hard for in the Constitution committee, namely, advise the provinces that the committee would give them the opportunity to be heard before the committee if they wished to make representations. However, after due consideration the committee agreed that they should be notified, and Senator Goldenberg sent a letter to them. I do not know whether any of them will ever actually want to come before the committee, but I think some of them have reserved their decision and have said, "We will let you know."

I was really very surprised when I heard that the Province of British Columbia had not been given an opportunity to appear before the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, although, as I say, I do not think it would necessarily have made any difference. I can see, though, that one of the reasons was that there was the smell of an election around on Monday, and there was a feeling that this bill had to go through this week. I presume that this situation had some influence on what happened. I suppose the feeling was that if we had delayed it at all for British Columbia to make representations, the bill could not have been passed in time before dissolution.

From what I smell now I do not think there is going to be any dissolution until next week, at the earliest. There is, therefore, time to give British Columbia an opportunity to appear, so that at least it could be said they had their day in court. For that reason I support the amendment, because I would not want us to establish a precedent here today which might imperil a future recommendation of the Constitution committee with regard to the general type of procedure we should follow in these instances.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, Senator Godfrey has said most of the things that I would have said myself. I think the committee did make a mistake in not hearing representations from the Province of British Columbia directly. I therefore endorse what Senator Godfrey has said, and I, too, support the amendment.

I would like to add one more thing, however. There has been a great deal of talk to the effect that the proposed House of the Federation that was referred to in Bill C-60 of the last session would provide a forum in which federal-provincial matters could be discussed. I have always thought that this was ridiculous. I have always felt that provincial governments would never entrust to members of a federal agency, even one conceived in the rather fantastic way that the House of the Federation was conceived, the resolution of disputes between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces.

Obviously the governments of the provinces are going to want to state their own case. I can well believe that Senator Bell stated the case on behalf of British Columbia just as well as any member of the government of that province could have done, but the plain fact of the matter is that the members of the Government of British Columbia wanted the opportunity to do this themselves, and I feel that the committee ought to have given it to them.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, not really having followed this matter, or the activities of the committee related to it, very closely, my brief intervention will be mainly in the form of two questions that I would like to pose either to the Leader of the Government in the Senate or to the chairman of the committee.

First, does the recommendation to the other place that is included in the committee's report represent the views of the British Columbia government? If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, then a meeting with the British Columbia representatives would, in my view, be rather useless.

Secondly, does the Senate have the constitutional authority to amend a bill in order to meet British Columbia's views more directly and more effectively? If the answer to this question is in the negative, then the Senate would be doing all it possibly can to meet the views of British Columbia by formally approving the recommendation of the committee that is contained in the committee's report, as Senator Langlois would like us to do.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have the same concerns as those expressed by Senator Godfrey a few moments ago, particularly in my capacity as Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution. That committee has been working very hard to find ways of acceding to the obvious desire of people in government, at least, in various parts of Canada, including the federal government—a view which has been expressed in certain reports which have come forward from task forces and committees of various organizations—to the effect that the role of the Senate for the future, whether it has been played before or not, should be that of a forum where there can at least be discussion, or ventilation, perhaps, of regional concerns, regional alienations and regional problems.

The committee has been working very hard, as I say, on this problem, and we will be bringing before you, I hope, before too long, a report which will include certain recommendations as to how the role of the Senate might be improved in that regard.

I think I would be inclined to vote for the amendment, except for the case which I have heard made by those who were involved in the committee—and I was not—and by the mover of the motion. I say this because, as a result of listening very carefully to Senator Roblin, Senator Flynn, Senator Smith (Colchester) and others, all of them very much admired colleagues of mine who have made great contributions to the discussions in the Constitution committee, it appears to me, trying to look at this matter as objectively as I can, that the position of the Government of British Columbia was very fully put before the committee. There was a brief before the committee—

Senator Phillips: A brief was not put before the committee.

Senator Stanbury: I am sorry, but unless I heard wrongly, there was a brief put before the committee. I am told that the document I now have in my hand is the very brief which was put before the committee.

Senator Phillips: May I ask the honourable senator when it was placed before the committee?

Senator Frith: When we were hearing their side of it during the second day.

Senator Stanbury: I am not a member of the committee, and I am dealing now only with what I have heard today, which, among other things, is to the effect that a brief was before the committee, that representations were made to the committee by senators from British Columbia—

Senator Flynn: One senator.

Senator Stanbury: All right, one senator. That one senator is as good as six, as far as I am concerned.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Thanks on behalf of the others.

Senator Smith (Colchester): She has only one vote.

Senator Stanbury: As I understand it, the whole matter was considered very fully before the committee. I feel that the committee owed the courtesy to the ministers from British Columbia to respond to their request, and I am upset about that aspect of this matter.

● (1550)

Apart from that, if the members of the opposition who are members of the committee had been concerned at the time—I am not looking at it in retrospect now, but if they had been concerned about this matter at the time the committee was sitting, it seems to me that one of them should have moved that the committee invite the ministers from British Columbia to come and be heard. Instead of that, it sounds to me as though the members of the opposition who were on the committee felt that the needs of the Government of British Columbia would be adequately served by the addition of the rider which, I understand, was put at the end of the committee report at the request of the Leader of the Opposition. If they were satisfied at that time that the addition of that rider was sufficient to protect the interests of British Columbia, then I think it hardly lies in their mouths now to say that something they failed to do when the committee was sitting is something that we must all be involved in doing now.

I believe that the committee has done its job well. I am sorry that it did not communicate directly with the ministers who made this request, but I have no doubt in my mind that the result is the proper result.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, we have had a long and, I think, a very useful discussion of this rather critical matter which is now before the Senate. I was impressed with the fact that all of those who supported the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition were obviously trying very hard to show restraint because this is a matter in which it would have been very easy for some, particularly members of the opposition in the Senate, to go beyond the issue itself. It seems to me, in spite of all that has been said, that the issue is a very simple one, namely, that the committee made a mistake in not replying at any time to the request of the Province of British Columbia to be heard, and in not arranging to hear the Province of British Columbia. It seems to me that is the only real question raised by Senator Flynn's amendment because all he is suggesting is that the committee reconsider the matter. I feel, in the light of all that has been said, that this would certainly be the better part of wisdom. It would indicate a degree of concern by the committee about what has happened.

It is fair to compliment the committee on their statement of concern. The committee showed concern about this whole matter. They make it very clear in several paragraphs in their recommendation that they are concerned about the effect the bill would have on projects. The chairman has explained why the word "projects" was used and not the word "provinces." They are concerned that these projects will not qualify for assistance and, therefore, they recommend alternative methods. To me it is all to the credit of the committee that, having refused to hear a province of the Confederation of Canada, they realized that an injustice was done, and they have recommended that an alternative method be found to achieve the result which the Province of British Columbia sought to bring about by appearing before the committee.

It is unfortunate—and there have been references to this fact—that this matter has arisen at a time when our own Constitution Committee, the public media, the government itself and the provinces are concerned about the future role of the Senate. Many of us have said that while there is pretty general agreement that we can change our ways, and that there are many things that can be done to make the Senate more effective, a good case can be made that the Senate can realize all the expectations of the public of Canada for its effectiveness in Confederation without any very substantial or earth-shaking changes in the institution itself. For that reason many of us feel that we should start right away.

This, to some extent, has been the tenor of discussion in the Constitution Committee—we do not have to wait until there are constitutional changes or until somebody else forces a course of action on us; we can go to work right now and begin to meet the requirements that some people think we should be meeting.

That is why it seems to me particularly unfortunate that this situation has arisen at this particular time because, no matter what we say about the external facts, the clear situation we are faced with is a refusal by a committee of the Senate of Canada to hear a formal request from the government of a province of Canada to be heard. I do not know how often such a request has been made, but I do not remember any. I know that provinces have responded to requests by committees, but I do not know of another example in all our recent history where a government of a province has come forward and said, "There is a bill before a committee of the Senate, and we ask to be heard." It is very unusual for a committee of the Senate to refuse to hear anybody. That is one of the extraordinary things about the situation. My experience in committees has been that we do our best, and there have been times when we did not refuse to hear some crackpots. Therefore, to me it is doubly unfortunate that this has happened at this time and in this way.

For that reason I must support the amendment because it does give us a chance to say, "It was a mistake." No committee, no chairman of a committee, and no sponsor of a bill ought to hang his head in shame if he says, "Yes, on hindsight, we made a mistake."

All right; how can we rectify it? It is not too hard. It has been suggested that we take another look at it and that we reconsider. Surely the essence of the solution to any problem is for people to say, "Well, I will reconsider my decision; let me think about it". That is all, so far as I am concerned, that those of us who are directly supporting this amendment are saying.

Many things have been said that, to some extent, I would think tend to cloud that central issue. The Leader of the Government made what I thought was a very eloquent and impassioned plea for consideration of the external facts. I have no intention whatsoever of questioning a thing he said. Without knowing the facts, I am quite prepared to accept everything that was said about the Government of British Columbia—that they were dilatory; that they had every opportunity to put their position before the minister; and that somebody there made a mistake. That is quite possible; I am no judge of that. But let's say that they did; let's say that in the course of the bureaucratic administration, or administration by responsible ministers, they made every mistake in the book—and that could be—but is that a reason for refusing them the right to come and say, "We want to be heard"? Perhaps they were coming to say they made a mistake—to say, "We have come to the foot of the Throne with a plea for equity." That might well have been their purpose.

● (1600)

I think Senator Frith went rather too far when he said that the whole of the other side, meaning the Government of British Columbia side, had been heard. He did not say that just once. It was practically the theme of his sermon. He said that they were heard in exactly the way the Province of British Columbia wanted to be heard, if I have taken down his words correctly. He said that the committee had the whole of the evidence before it; that the other side had been fully heard. Surely he did not mean that. Here was the main provincial government concerned asking to be heard. Surely it is going too far to say that the whole case was heard when the main body that wanted to be heard was not there and was refused a hearing.

That may be his judgment, which I would question, having heard what he did, having heard about a brief—and as far as I know there is no evidence that that brief was ever formally put before the committee, but that does not matter. Having heard one side of it, plus a representation by a senator—and I do not care if there had been representations by 40 people there—it is still not correct to say that both sides had been fully heard when the main entity that wanted to be heard was refused a hearing.

That is all I want to say on that, except that I would be inclined to question some apparent bias that Senator Frith has towards the Government of British Columbia, because he spoke of their formal representations at the meeting of first ministers as being "contemptuous of the Senate." I did not find it that way at all. I did not agree with a word of it; I did not agree with their reading of history, but I did not find it contemptuous of the Senate. But that is perhaps an aside.

Senator Lamontagne made an interesting contribution. He wondered if it would have been constitutional for the Senate to amend the bill. I do not think that point has been raised at all. We have not discussed the possibility of amending the bill. The committee, in its wisdom, has taken its own way to correct, as far as it could, what it saw as the problem created between the federal government and the provincial government, which was a dispute about who mailed what and when, and whether there was delay in the post office and whether the deadline should have been relaxed to accommodate the provincial government. That was a dispute between the federal government and the Government of British Columbia. What we are dealing with here is the situation between the government of a province and a committee of the Senate. It is with that that I am concerned, and shall be increasingly concerned if the motion in amendment is not carried.

I would plead with honourable senators to see it this way. I believe it would be to the credit of the Senate, and I believe to the eternal credit of this committee, which does a good job and has a good chairman, if they would say, "All right, let's play it cool. It's not a bad idea to look at it again." Whether the Government of British Columbia would come I don't know, but I think it would be greatly to the credit of this institution, this Senate, if that were done.

The whole matter has been complicated by the statement that was made by the committee chairman in favour of the recommendation. Senator Smith (Colchester) has dealt with this in impassioned language which I think was justified. I should like to read what the chairman said. These are words that will cause ongoing problems between the Senate and the Province of British Columbia, and probably other provinces, because this is the official interpretation of the decision of the committee; this is why the committee took the attitude it did. The chairman said the committee found:

The purpose of Bill C-2 was to terminate the Health Resources Fund a year and some months ahead of its original expiry date, and certainly in light of that it was felt by the committee—

Again I emphasize the fact that the committee did have feelings, although it had another feeling later on:

—it was felt by the committee that every province would probably object to its passage.

As has been said, he thought the committee really felt that. Felt it where? In the brain, the heart? It really felt that every province would object; that every province in Canada would say, "We don't want this bill passed." One province wants to come before the Senate and put the case.

Senator Langlois: "Assume" would be a better word.

Senator Grosart: I am just making the point that it was felt by the committee that every province would probably object. It was the feeling of the committee. The committee had feelings. Here I am not being sarcastic. The chairman went on:

It was the feeling that we had nothing further to learn from the provinces.

Senator Smith (Colchester) has emphasized that. That sentence frightens me. If the time should come when this distinguished and venerable institution is abolished, I can almost see those words on a bronze tablet on the site of this chamber:

It was the feeling that we had nothing further to learn from the provinces.

We had received a brief from one province outlining their objection, and we had the response of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Of course the committee had.

I return, honourable senators, to my plea. We have all made mistakes. Perhaps some of us, in the heat of debate, have prompted somebody to say something that might have been better not said, and if I have been responsible for that I make my apology. All I ask now is that we agree that we all made a mistake.

Senator Stanbury made reference to the fact that members of the opposition here were not alert and did not do all they might have done. I hope we will not hear too much of that argument until the Senate is in the fortunate position of having an opposition that is much larger than the group at present on this side—which hopefully will not be too far away. But until that time, I would ask that that criticism of our group be not made.

We try to work; we try to cover these committees. It is true that on this particular occasion a few senators on this side were at the committee meeting. I am not a member of the committee, so the criticism was obviously not levelled at me. However, this situation does happen, and will happen again and again as long as we have, as we have had in the last week, four committees sitting at the same time, with three senators from this side on each one of them. That is a situation we have to face here, so I ask that we be not criticized on that account.

The suggestion has been made, however, that because the Leader of the Opposition was there for some of the time and the suggestion to make the recommendation, the generous recommendation, was his, it means that he agreed to the refusal of the committee to hear the Province of British Columbia. I would say it is the very opposite. Perhaps knowing there had been this refusal and anticipating the damage it would do to the reputation of the Senate, it is quite likely the Leader of the Opposition said, "Let's do the best we can. Let's at least ameliorate the thing." I don't know whether that is so, but it seems to me unfair to suggest that because the Leader of the Opposition was there for part of the time that the committee was sitting he is somehow to blame for this whole matter getting to the stage it has got to.

I repeat, then, honourable senators, my plea. Let's think about this; let's undo the harm we have done, and I believe it will be to the credit of us all.

Senator Stanbury: May I just take a moment to clarify and perhaps correct what my honourable friend was suggesting I had said? I was not in any way criticizing the members of the opposition. I was saying that the fact that they proposed the rider they did propose to the report of the committee was an indication to me that they regarded that as a satisfactory answer to the problem. That certainly was not intended in any way as a criticism of their sense of duty or their ability to carry out that duty because, as I think honourable senators know, I have great admiration for each of them individually and for the tremendous effort they make collectively on behalf of the opposition in the Senate. I really have very high regard for them.

I would not want particularly the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition to go away—I guess I had better not say he is right; I had better only say he is honourable—I would not want him to go away with any thought that I was criticizing the excellent work he does in all respects in this house. I was simply indicating that it seemed to me, without now looking at it in retrospect and trying to decide what was in the minds of the people at that time, to indicate that the Leader of the Opposition felt that the addition of the rider at that time was what was required; that by adding that rider he felt he had done his duty. I am sure that if he felt he had not done his duty, he would have done something more because he does his duty at all times.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, am I interpreting Senator Grosart's intervention correctly as saying that we ought to hear the British Columbia representatives—just to hear them—but we can take no other remedial action other than that proposed by the committee to meet their views?

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, my answer, of course, is that all I have suggested is that I am supporting the amendment which would be that the committee reconsider what has happened. That is all. To me, reconsideration in a situation like this is inevitably the start of some improvement in relations between the disputants.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I simply want to put something on the record with regard to the comments made by Senator Stanbury.

When I attended the committee meeting—and I must say that I had attended three committee meetings that morning—I was informed that a motion was before the committee. I think Senator Roblin read the record which referred to a motion made by Senator Inman to have the British Columbia representatives appear, as they had expressed that wish. So, I understood that this matter would be put before the committee.

With regard to the recommendation, there are two things I want to say. First, my experience on this side of the house, with the few troops I have around me, has always indicated to me that, when I can get it, a recommendation is better than nothing at all.

Secondly, at the time when the recommendation was discussed, it was suggested that the Senate did not have the power to amend the bill. I checked on that and the information I have now convinces me that the Senate has the power to amend the bill. But at the time the recommendation was suggested and discussed, it appeared that it was practically the only thing we could do. That is not the case. That is another mistake that we can and should correct.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I provide some information that has just come to me from the Province of British Columbia? The Deputy to the Minister of Education has welcomed the Senate recommendation as being in accord with British Columbia's wishes.

I wanted to communicate that information to you. I would expect a teletyped confirmation this afternoon from the office of the minister.

Senator Flynn: He is like I am—he would rather have a recommendation than nothing at all.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I should like to intervene simply for the purpose of making two footnotes to the discussion which has taken place.

First of all, I think it is incorrect to say that nobody raised yesterday in the house here the possibility that the Senate did have the power to amend this bill. I specifically rose on that last night and mentioned it, but in the commotion that was going on I suppose my not very stentorian tones were not heard or, if they were heard, even the fact that I quoted the opinion of the Law Clerk of the Senate was considered to be of no importance.

The real point I think that needs to be made, though—the very simple point that needs to be made, which has already been made but can be put perhaps even more concisely, is that even if people in the committee took a certain decision in the light of what they heard and saw and thought and felt then, it does not follow that the same people may not change their minds in the light of new information.

I am not a member of the committee. I was present, however, the other afternoon for most of its deliberations, I think. I think I left after 6 o'clock. At the time, I was under the same impression as the Leader of the Opposition, that probably we did not have the power to make an amendment.

[Senator Flynn.]

On that, I think now I was quite mistaken as a result of what the Law Clerk has said to me.

I thought also that probably there wasn't really very much to be gained by hearing further representations beyond what we had already heard from one senator from British Columbia. My mind doesn't move very fast and it was only later, in the light of further information, that I decided that my passivity in the matter—obviously I could not make a motion but I might have spoken—and my contentment with the position the committee was taking up was a mistake. But the point I want to make, with all the emphasis at my command, is that no matter what mistakes any committee may make, the Senate ought not to be bound by the mistakes of a committee. The Senate should be in a position to say in regard to the report of any committee whatever, "We do not think that this is a good report. We think that the committee should consider this again. We think this, that or the other that the committee has done is inadequate."

If we are going to be put in the position where we are told, "Well, the committee decided this and really, after all, nobody in the committee spoke up and moved a motion to the contrary so everybody must have been satisfied," then I am afraid we are getting back into the position that Senator Roblin and I and a few others found ourselves in back last December when the action of a committee—even in that case rather a provisional action—was considered rather to close the case altogether.

I simply cannot accept the position that the Senate is bound or ought to be bound by any proceedings whatsoever in any committee. No matter how eminent the members, no matter how hard they worked, no matter how brilliant their intellects, I think it must always be open to this body to say we think the committee made a mistake and ask the committee to reconsider, and even after it has reconsidered, when the bill comes back to us from the committee, we have the right to say: Well, we think the committee has still made a mistake and we propose to do something about it.

• (1620)

Senator Lamontagne: I wonder whether the honourable senator would permit a question.

Senator Forsey: Certainly.

Senator Lamontagne: He referred in his remarks to some legal advice he received on the authority of this chamber to amend the bill. I wonder if he could expand on that.

Senator Flynn: It is not related.

Senator Forsey: I would prefer to have that done by some lawyer, but my information, from the authority I quoted—and I hope I am not out of order in saying that I have the opinion of the Law Clerk of the Senate—was that this was not a money bill, that there was no royal recommendation when it was presented in the House of Commons, that the amendment which was made by the House of Commons was not objected to on the ground that there should have been a royal recommendation, that the expenditure that took place under this bill was provided for by the original act and that all that was done in this bill was to put in a cut-off date.

If it were really a money bill, it would be beyond our scope to amend, and then it would have to be preceded by a royal recommendation in the other place, and the proceedings which have taken place up to this point would be completely invalid in the absence of any such royal recommendation. In that case, we have no bill before us at all.

Senator Phillips: Before beginning a few remarks in support of the amendment, I should like to direct a question to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. Senator Stanbury referred to a brief from the Province of British Columbia. I should like to know when the brief was received, who presented the brief to the committee, and whether it was attached to the proceedings of the committee, as part of our normal procedure?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I received two briefs, one from the Department of National Health and Welfare which showed, chronologically, what had happened by province and the answers given by the federal government. A short brief was presented to me by Senator Bell. I did not receive any others.

Senator Phillips: Thank you, Senator Bonnell. I am sure, in view of your remarks, that Senator Stanbury will now wish to reconsider how he is going to vote on the amendment.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to criticize the committee's hearings or the action of the committee. I think Senator Godfrey expressed the attitude of the committee very well when he said there was an air of dissolution—

Senator Godfrey: A smell of dissolution.

Senator Phillips: A smell of dissolution in the air. I think possibly, in retrospect, we were sort of overawed by this aspect of it and, perhaps, did not think we had time to hear from British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: They seem satisfied. Why don't you phone them to find out?

Senator Phillips: Why? If the chairman of the committee did not bother phoning the ministers in British Columbia, why should any other member of the committee phone them?

Senator Perrault: Don't confuse the facts.

Senator Flynn: You can say that again.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That points out how poorly the thing was run by the chairman.

Senator Phillips: I should like to inform honourable senators that, following the motion made by Senator Inman at the committee, I pointed out it would be very difficult to refuse the application from the Province of British Columbia for a hearing. I still feel that way. I can think back to a time when a representative from the Province of British Columbia appeared before the special Senate committee chaired by Senator Stanbury. I asked that representative if he had ever asked to appear before a Senate committee before. That representative said no, rather abashedly I think, and admitted they were probably in error. They have now asked, and I think the shoe is on the other foot. I think the Senate is in error in refusing them the right to appear.

I should like to refer to the remarks made by the sponsor of the bill, Senator Frith. He has again today continued with the attitude he displayed in committee. I illustrate that by reading this remark from the blues. This exchange took place when I suggested that British Columbia should be heard. He said, "Does that go for everybody else too? Is there any other reason? Are we really not talking about whether this is a good idea or a bad idea?" I think it has been prevalent throughout his argument today that it might be a bad idea. It might be just a bit embarrassing if British Columbia did turn up—and we must not have that, honourable senators. I think it would be far more embarrassing for us to look back on today if we do not support the amendment.

I find it difficult to follow the conclusion of Senator Frith when he says that British Columbia was well heard. Honourable senators, how can one say to a province that the committee heard all the evidence and all the claims and yet refuse them the right to appear before the committee? How can we say that they have been well heard? They have been well heard in absentia; they have been well heard in silence. How can we say that and then, as an afterthought, refer to a brief that was not submitted? I do not think we can do that. I do not go along with hearings being held in absentia, whether they be held in the Senate or in the court room. If they were held in the court room, any party in a suit would be able to appear.

This would be a very dangerous precedent for us to establish and one, I think, which we would regret in the future.

The Leader of the Government, that distinguished senator from British Columbia, said that the fault lies completely with the Province of British Columbia. I don't exactly accept that viewpoint. I would refer honourable senators to a letter which was sent by the British Columbia Ministry of Health to the Department of National Health and Welfare. This letter is dated August 30, 1978, and it is the first application that British Columbia makes on behalf of the Children's/Grace Hospital.

Honourable senators, I could read this letter into the record, but I think it would be far better evidence if it were appended to today's Hansard, and I ask permission to do that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[For text of letter see Appendix "A", p. 711.]

Senator Perrault: That is right out of context. What about all the other correspondence? Are you putting that on the record too?

Senator Phillips: If you wish, by all means. I would be delighted to have that appended to today's proceedings.

Senator Smith (Colchester): That won't do your case any good.

Senator Phillips: The Honourable Leader of the Government disappeared from the chamber and then came back in and stated that the Minister of Education for British Columbia is pleased with the recommendation of the Senate committee. I am rather intrigued, honourable senators, to find out how the Minister of Education, Science and Technology for the Province of British Columbia learned about the recommendation of the committee. The chairman of the committee certainly did not inform him. I am wondering how he became so informed. I don't think there was that much coverage in the press.

● (1630)

Senator Perrault: I read it to him over the telephone.

Senator Flynn: You begged for that statement.

Senator Perrault: That is a disgusting remark to make—disgusting!

Senator Flynn: No, what is disgusting is the way in which you proceeded in this particular case.

Senator Phillips: So, the answer was not as spontaneous as it appeared. I would draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that unless the government accepts the recommendation of this committee, the recommendation is absolutely worthless. It is not worth the paper it is written on. If the Leader of the Government is so thrilled with it, I would ask him to now rise and, on behalf of the Government of Canada, commit this government to accepting the recommendation of the committee. We would all be an awful lot better off if he would do that.

Will you do that, Senator Perrault?

Senator Flynn: That would end the debate.

An Hon. Senator: Question!

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I should like to put on the record the situation as it was presented to me and to those senators who were able to attend both committee meetings. First of all, let me say I am sympathetic to the point of view of the opposition and the difficulty they have with having representation at all committee meetings. I admire the way they do get around and cover as well as they do the committee meetings.

I do not know whether Senator Phillips is acquainted with the Honourable Pat McGeer, the Minister of Education, Science and Technology for British Columbia, but I would suggest to you, Senator Phillips, that you do not get responses from him by wheedling them out of him. Any response he gives is honest and fair. The suggestion that a telephone call from the Leader of the Government could elicit some contrived reaction on the part of the Honourable Pat McGeer is a bit of an insult, if I may put it as harshly as that, to the integrity of the Honourable Pat McGeer.

When Senator Bell was making her presentation to us, a number of us asked her what it was she was bringing forward—whether it was simply a letter from someone, or what. She replied that it was a document that came from the provincial Minister of Education, and on that basis we gave it great credence. We studied it in depth. Because of that document, we wanted to get the other side of the picture, which was the response by the Honourable Monique Bégin to the pertinent questions raised by the Honourable Mr. McGeer. It was assumed that, as a cabinet minister in the Government of British Columbia, he was speaking for the government. So there was a brief that clearly outlined the point of view of the Government of British Columbia and their complaints.

We got a complete reply the following day. I congratulate the staff of the Department of National Health and Welfare. They had to work, I am sure, long hours to get all the answers we requested. We then had both the point of view of the Minister of National Health and Welfare and, as well, a detailed letter from the Honourable Mr. McClelland—

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might interrupt Senator Thompson for a moment. There seems to be some confusion in relation to briefs which I was scattering about like rose petals. I should explain that Senator Thompson, as the senator on the Health, Welfare and Science Committee from Ontario, and as one who has long been associated with the Health Resources Fund, and Senator Bonnell, as the chairman of the committee, and Senator Phillips, with whom I had discussed the Health Resources Fund problem—

Senator Phillips: Not with me.

Senator Bell: I had forwarded to Senator Thompson and Senator Bonnell a brief outline of the position of the Government of British Columbia. Not being a member of the committee, I wanted them to know ahead of time what some of the problems of British Columbia were.

So it was not a brief. It was merely an outline which I sent to them by way of background information. I hope that will clarify it.

Senator Thompson: As I understood it—and I think this could be substantiated by reference to the committee proceedings—when you were asked the basis on which you were making the outline you said the basis on which you were able to substantiate your arguments was that the document came from the Minister of Education for British Columbia, the Honourable Pat McGeer.

That document led to questions on the part of Senator Bell and others wanting clarification from the minister. Speaking for myself—and I am sure this applies to most senators—because it was a children's hospital, my feeling was to do whatever I could to help the cause. We looked at it, I think, with a great deal of sympathy. We looked at the letter of October 25 from the Government of British Columbia to the federal minister outlining the argument of the Government of British Columbia; we looked at the letter of February 16, which again reasserted the position of the B.C. government.

These were letters to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and were signed by the B.C. Minister of Health, the Honourable Mr. McClelland. We looked at a further letter, this one dated January 15, again to the Honourable Monique Bégin from the Honourable R. H. McClelland, and a letter of March 5, both of which again stated the points of view that the B.C. minister felt should be taken into consideration by the Honourable Monique Bégin.

In light of that, it is my view that we did have a picture of what the situation was from the point of view of the B.C. government. It appears that it is a technicality which is causing some of the difficulty. I could be critical of the B.C. government. They started this children's hospital in November 1977. Yet, it was after the deadline before they finally got their submission in.

Because we were all looking for ways in which we could help the B.C. government in this respect, I thought at first that perhaps the B.C. government was new to this. But then I found out that in the year 1977-78 it had already received $21 million for a Health Science Centre. In fact, B.C. utilized the fund to the level of 88 per cent. Given those facts, the pattern of the procedure by which the provinces apply for and receive these grants must have been apparent to them. Manitoba, for example—and I am sorry Senator Roblin is not in his seat—had only utilized the fund to the level of some 65 per cent.

I am delighted that the B.C. provincial minister has said that the Senate has looked objectively at the legislation.

Senator Flynn: You cannot take that for granted.

Senator Thompson: Well, he is delighted with the result, and whether or not we were objective, it appears from the report of the Leader of the Government—

● (1640)

Senator Flynn: It all depends how it was put to him. I can well imagine how the Leader of the Government informed the minister.

Senator Perrault: That was your style when you were in power. You are thinking of the old Tory days.

Senator Thompson: Well, I for one am convinced, when the Leader of the Government stands in this house and tells us that British Columbia is delighted with what has taken place, that it is so, and I believe him.

Senator Flynn: You just want it to be believed. Question!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bird, that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Grosart, that this bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for further consideration of the request made by the Government of British Columbia to appear before it.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

FURTHER MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I should like to move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that Bill C-2 be not now read a third time but that it be amended as follows:

Page 1, clause 1: Strike out lines 11, 12 and 13 and substitute the following:

"thereof is authorized by the Minister pursuant to subsection 4(1) or 5(1) on a proper application submitted before November 20, 1978."

● (1700)

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bird, that this bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Bell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey that Bill C-2 be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

Page 1, clause 1: Strike out lines 11, 12 and 13 and substitute the following:

"thereof is authorized by the Minister pursuant to subsection 4(1) or 5(1) on a proper application submitted before November 20, 1978."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be allowed to say a few words regarding the amendment. I seem to have received some criticism from the Senate for conferring with ministers of the Crown in British Columbia, and criticism also from ministers of the Crown in British Columbia for not doing my job in the Senate. So some days we are damned if we do and damned if we don't.

I know that I have mentioned this before, perhaps two or three years ago, as has the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In fact, we have tried to get governments in British Columbia—and during my time in the Senate we have had two Social Credit governments and one NDP government in British Columbia—to tell us their problems and to confer with us.

On this occasion I was not acting any differently from my usual custom. If we have a problem concerning a piece of legislation before the Senate dealing with forestry, I get in touch with British Columbia forest product companies to find out how the legislation will affect a particular area. I obtain their advice. If it is a problem regarding fisheries, I speak to fishermen I can trust, or with the unions or packing companies. In connection with the Maritime Code, I spoke with the vessel owners, and so on.

I cannot see any other way of proceeding. This is a bill which has to do with the British Columbia government; so naturally I wanted to find out their opinion. That is my customary way of operating.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bell: I should like to make it very clear that they did not brief me. I asked them. I also made it very clear to both the Minister of Health and the Minister of Education, Science and Technology in British Columbia—in thanking them for their information, for the briefing they gave me subsequent to my request—that I was acting independently and that I would draw my own conclusions from the material that came before me as a member of the Senate. That, I hope, I am doing.

Honourable senators may recall that when Senator Frith, the eloquent mover of Bill C-2, explained the principle of the bill, I was quite incredulous. I could not believe that we had accomplished so much in a short time, that we were able to graduate all those worthy medical students who were able to become good medical practitioners—because according to my information, in British Columbia—and, so far as I knew, across the country—only one student out of perhaps 1,000 applicants was selected.

● (1710)

On looking into this I find that we graduated 80 medical students in British Columbia last year. The British Columbia College of Physicians and Surgeons registered 300 from outside the province, and indeed from outside Canada. British Columbia is rectifying this situation by doubling its medical training capacity, part of this being possible as a result of the help received from this fund.

What I was incredulous about at the time the bill was introduced for second reading was that an action such as this would be possible, that a bill passed in Parliament in 1966 could suddenly be cut off when Parliament was not sitting. In other words, this was an executive action, unapproved of and unassented to by Parliament. I feel that the actions taken subsequently to this are illegal until Parliament approves them. That is why we are here just now, and that is why I find this business of the date and time so upsetting. We are being asked to rectify an illegal action of the government—that is what it amounts to—retroactively. I think that in the Senate we are not in favour of retroactive legislation unless it is of particular benefit to the people of Canada. It could be argued that we are going to save $74 million, which was already allotted, and which was supposed to last till the end of 1980. Perhaps that is a benefit. I do not know. That is one of the things, however, that I find very disturbing in Senator Frith's analysis of the bill.

Another thing that I find very disturbing is the lack of consultation. I realize that sound reasons have been given for this, in one sense; but in another sense we know that in 1966, before this excellent Health Resources Fund was made into an effective working law, much consultation went on. All provinces were consulted, an ad hoc committee was formed, and it worked very well. The official who appeared before the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science said that the co-operation with all provinces had been excellent all through the 12 years of the life of that act, which has accomplished a great deal of good. The government is to be congratulated on its foresight in helping the country develop its health resources and research facilities, and in this way meet the needs of the people.

Something that we keep forgetting in all of this is that the government has no money of its own. Parliament, in the name of the people of Canada, has voted this $500 million for this particular purpose. If this money is to be cut off, it is Parliament that should say when it is to be cut off, and for what reason, but only if the reason is good and sufficient.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear.

Senator Bell: One of the things we have heard this afternoon is that the Senate does not provide adequate regional representation. I think it was the new Attorney General of Nova Scotia who said at the constitutional conference that took place at the end of October last that he was quite satisfied with regional representation, but that he was a little disturbed about the aspect of sober second thought. He felt that we were not giving the consideration to certain bills that we perhaps should be giving. Some of us can remember, I have no doubt, that in recent times we could be faulted for this, and the possibility of an election has been held out as an excuse. This is what happened last year with regard to the Labour Code. I think we all remember that, and we are still suffering from not giving it due attention. I hope we will not do that at this time with regard to this particular bill.

We have an excellent minister, who, I feel, is really not getting the support and encouragement she needs. She does not want to make these cuts. If we look at what she has accomplished and at what the Government of British Columbia is asking for, as far as I am concerned there is no reason why we cannot make this work in such a way that federal-provincial relations will not be made more difficult in the future, simply because there is a technical flaw connected with a postal strike.

It has already been put on record that the ministers of British Columbia sent a telegram asking to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. The telegram was sent to the chairman, and a list was read out indicating that copies were sent to all members of the committee and to all members of the B.C. caucus in the Senate. I may say that I have never received my copy of that telegram. I do not know if anyone except the chairman has received a copy. If that can happen to a telegram that was sent out last Friday afternoon, even allowing for the time difference between British Columbia and here, and even supposing the B.C. government was being very restrained in sending the telegram at night rates, surely by Wednesday afternoon we should have had our telegrams. That is not the fault of the post office, it is the fault of the telegraph service. Perhaps B.C. did not get its application in the mail quickly enough—and I am not saying that that is the case; we will look at the evidence and see—but I think that there is something very wrong with our communications service in Canada.

I hope you will approve this amendment. I think it will solve the problem we have. I hope we will hear no more about it and that good relations will be established again with the provinces.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Bell thinks that I can support this amendment, she completely misunderstood my reasons for supporting the previous amendment. I do feel that the ministers from British Columbia should have been heard: that might have had a bearing on the bill in general, and on whether it was passed or whether there should be general changes; but once the date of November 4 was set, then I think we were stuck with that date. It is true that to move the date to November 20 might accommodate British Columbia, but what do we know about other provinces, who, if they had known that the cutoff date was to be extended by more than two weeks, might have had applications in as well? It seems to me the date of November 4 having been announced by the minister, it is exactly the same as a budget speech. We either have to accept it, or defeat the bill in its entirety.

It is well known that I think it is a pity that this program was cut off without continuing it until December 31, 1980. But having once made a change I cannot support an amendment that would have the effect of bringing in one project in one province without regard to what the effect might have been had a different date been announced in relation to the other provinces of Canada.

I am afraid, therefore, that much as I am in sympathy with the needs of British Columbia, I cannot support an amendment designed specifically to accommodate a certain project in that one province.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have only a few words to say.

Senator Hicks, I think, does not understand or is not familiar with the situation. We were very careful in committee to establish that this is the only problem of this kind. The application was sent unsigned, but with a signed letter, which arrived on time. The application was returned because the requirement was for an application duly signed on the form itself. It was the form duly signed that arrived a little too late. It is therefore merely a technical defect in the application that prevents British Columbia, under the bill as drafted, from getting what they requested. We made sure in committee—the minister, Madam Bégin, told us, and I think the deputy minister, Dr. Dupont, told us as well—that there were no other cases of that kind. None.

● (1720)

We are not creating hardship for anyone else but only offering additional help in this special case. By changing the date we are only doing what the minister herself did in the other place. The first time the cutoff date was September 8, and it was changed to November 4. So we are saying that if the application was made correctly before November 20, 1978, the minister is authorized to make the payment as provided in the present legislation; that is all we are doing. We are doing no injustice to anyone.

Furthermore, since the Leader of the Government thought of phoning the provincial minister to tell him of the Senate's great achievement in making a recommendation, it seems to me that by passing this legislation we would give the government leader an opportunity to phone him again and say, "Not only have we recommended that they look after your problem, but we have solved it." I am sure he will rush to the telephone if the Senate has the courage to adopt this amendment and correct something that is entirely unfair.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thompson: I should just like to clarify a misunderstanding that the honourable Leader of the Opposition has. As I understand it, the unsigned document that was presented to the Department of National Health and Welfare was considered by neither the provincial department nor the federal department as the official document. The requirement is for signed documents, and these have to go through a process of being signed by the deputy minister of the province plus the minister. This was a draft document to indicate the work plans and the specifications of the project. If he had had the opportunity of being able to go through this documentation which was presented to us—and I appreciate why he did not—he would have seen that there was a letter from Dr. Dupont, the Director-General of the Department of National Health and Welfare acknowledging these specifications and plans and saying that they agreed provided those modifications took place. This is a small point, but it is still important.

Senator Flynn: It does not change the substance of my argument.

Senator Frith: With respect, it changes it very substantially because it creates the impression that there was some technical refusal to recognize a document that was an unsigned application though the letter that included it was signed. In fact, it was clear from the evidence of Dr. Dupont that the practice was to send in a draft application for comments. In fact, that is what happened, and comments were sent back to British Columbia. Then they waited for the duly authorized application signed by the minister, which is a very important distinction, it seems to me.

Senator Flynn: There was also a mail strike.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, this is ridiculous. Perhaps we should go back to committee. What happened was that on August 30 or thereabouts this unsigned preliminary draft was submitted, and then the announcement came. No word had been heard, so British Columbia resubmitted the same thing because they knew there was very little that would be changed. Discussions had gone on between some of the departmental officials. They sent in the signed formal application on October 13. That crossed with the reply to the unsigned draft. British Columbia had to go with the reply to the unsigned draft. British Columbia had to go with the properly signed application which was sent on October 13 which got caught in the mail strike. They really were not quite as inept as some of us are being led to believe.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that in the last 20 minutes I have had an opportunity to have a very useful conversation with the Honourable Patrick McGeer, the Minister of Education of the Province of British Columbia.

Senator Flynn: Another one?

Senator Perrault: Senator, may I suggest that you could usefully make more constructive telephone calls and ascertain more facts before you speak with such misguided eloquence.

Senator Flynn: You are misguiding us.

Senator Perrault: Senator, would you remain seated unless you have a valid point of order? You know the rules better than that; you have been around this landscape for a considerable period of time.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Stop lecturing and get on with what you have to say.

Senator Perrault: The Minister of Education has undertaken to send a telegram to the Senate commending the Senate for its work with respect to this measure.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order. I will not accept what the Leader of the Government tells us about some conversation he had. If he wants to discuss this matter with the minister in my presence, I will take his word; otherwise, I challenge the Leader of the Government.

Senator Langlois: You have to take his word.

Senator Flynn: I think Mr. McGeer should be asked whether he is satisfied with the recommendation or whether he would prefer the amendment, and then bring me his reply.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I spoke with the minister. Let me convey to you, pending the delivery of a message from the minister—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: —the nature of the conversation.

Senator Flynn: It is totally improper.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is a classic case of the Leader of the Opposition's saying, "Don't confuse me with the facts; my mind is made up".

Senator Flynn: You invented that yourself. It is quite obvious.

Senator Perrault: He should actively pursue the capacity to maintain an open mind instead of an empty mind.

Honourable senators, the situation was fully described to the minister. The exact transcript of the Senate recommendation was read to the minister and telexed to him so a copy is available to him. He stated that he felt that there was no point in coming down to testify before the Senate committee in view of the fact that the Senate had produced an excellent recommendation to the government. He said, "Let me say the Senate's work is excellent—first class". He went on to say, "In any event, the Province of British Columbia will pursue this matter further. We feel the Government of Canada may have to respond to any testimony provided by us as a result of the Senate initiative." He added, "Everything that can be achieved has been achieved by the Senate, and I want to thank you."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: He stated that a telegram would be sent to the Senate.

If the honourable senator wishes to make his own telephone calls, I am sure Bell Canada is always available for the tariff, but I want him to know that, as candidly and as objectively as possible, I have set forth the alternatives for the honourable provincial minister, whom I have known for a great many years.

I have also pointed out the fact that the opposition pursued with great vigour today, as is their right, a request that the Province of British Columbia appear before the Senate committee. I said, "These are the alternatives before me as Leader of the Senate, and these are the alternatives before the Senate." The minister replied, "In view of the Senate recommendation, I see no necessity at this time for the Province of British Columbia to come."

Senator Roblin: May I ask a question of the Leader of the Government? Now that diplomatic relations have been restored with the Province of British Columbia, would he be so kind as to tell us whether he will make another effort to find out what they think about the amendment before us. If we are to have the minister's attitude to what we have discussed so far, I think it might be appropriate if the Leader of the Government would telephone him and ask him which he would prefer—the resolution that has been proposed by the committee, or the amendment to the bill proposed by my honourable friend, the senator from British Columbia, Senator Bell.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not going to get into a limitless process of contacting other ministers or other levels of government. It is time for the Senate to decide whether we are going to seriously consider the possibility of moving a deadline in order to accommodate one province—even although it may be the province of my birth—or whether a policy adopted by the government, which is not inconsistent with that pursued from time to time by all governments, shall be supported. For that reason I must oppose this amendment.

● (1730)

Senator Grosart: Would the Leader of the Government reply to this question? In his conversation with the British Columbia minister, did the minister say that he had no objection whatsoever to the fact that his department had been refused a hearing by the Senate committee? Did he make any comment on that? Did he say he was happy about it, or disliked it; if he made another such similar request, would he be equally happy if that request was refused by the committee?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, no complaint was registered by the minister.

Senator Grosart: I did not ask that.

Senator Perrault: No question was raised.

Senator Grosart: Would the Leader of the Government answer the question? I asked him specifically if he discussed the question of the refusal of the Senate committee to hear the minister's department?

Senator Perrault: The answer is no.

Senator Grosart: The answer is no. Fine.

Senator Roblin: Before I am asked to vote on this motion, may I inquire of the Leader of the Government whether he is in a position to give the house any assurance as to what action will be taken by the Government of Canada should this amendment be defeated, and the main motion is adopted with the subsequent motion that is going to be moved by his honourable colleague with respect to the rider that the committee has put before us? What I am trying to get at is what that rider means. It means an expression of opinion as far as we are concerned. It is to be given to the other house, and, as my honourable friend is a member of the Government of Canada, is he in a position to give us any undertaking as to what will happen when the Government of Canada considers it?

Senator Perrault: I can only repeat what I stated earlier. The Honourable Monique Bégin and members of cabinet have tried diligently to find and determine a reasonable way in which this request by the Province of British Columbia—as with similar requests of a similar type from other provinces—could be accommodated.

Senator Flynn: There are none from other provinces.

Senator Perrault: However, because of the undeniable fact that technically this application did not arrive until after the deadline, it is not possible to accommodate—

Senator Flynn: Certainly it is.

Senator Perrault: —this program under the Health Resources Fund Act—

Senator Flynn: With an amendment.

Senator Perrault: —which has brought untold benefits to Canadian medical science and research since its inception in 1966.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on!

Senator Perrault: I suggest that no other government has advanced a program that has been quite so useful as this program has been.

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Grosart: That is why you cut it off.

Senator Roblin: I should like to put a further question. Considering the fact that the present administration has, in one form or another, been in office for the last 18 years, I suppose we can't quarrel with the last remark. It is the only government we've got, so we've got to make the best of it. The point I am trying to make is that the Leader of the Government has told us of the ministry's concern to find a way around this problem to meet the problem of British Columbia. I ask my honourable friend if he does not think that the amendment now before us accomplishes that purpose completely?

Senator Perrault: The amendment before the chamber would negate completely a perfectly normal government procedure of establishing a cut-off date. Once a precedent is established for one province, that precedent invites and threatens the complete destruction of a policy—in this case a program—which is an important part of the restraint policies which have the support of the first ministers and the people of Canada.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Roblin: Would my honourable friend therefore support this proposition, if I may ask him the question, since he is seeking a way of accommodating British Columbia in this matter: If some other province came up with an equal case would he not seek to accommodate it? If that is the case, what is he arguing about?

Senator Perrault: The recommendation that goes forward from the Senate reflects great credit on the Senate, the kind of credit expressed today in such warm terms by the Minister of Education of the Province of British Columbia. May I suggest that noting this proposal, the other place will give fair consideration to the Senate recommendation.

As far as the program is concerned, statistics are available—

Senator Flynn: We are not asking anything about that.

Senator Perrault: —with respect to the percentage of participation by each of the provinces.

Senator Flynn: Oh no!

Senator Perrault: I am attempting to turn up the figure for the Province of Manitoba. I understand they have been eager participants in the program, and the federal government has been most pleased to co-operate with them.

Senator Forsey: So what!

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, I hope I shall not take very long—unless, of course, someone persuades me to do so. I really must protest that the Leader of the Government gives us very little credit for being able to see through a subterfuge. We all know why he called the British Columbia minister. He called because he had been pushed to the wall; he knew he was wrong, or his committee was wrong, and he had to do something to try to extricate himself from the most embarrassing position in which he had allowed himself to fall.

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Phillips: Have you phoned him before?

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Smith (Colchester): If he thinks we can't see through that he gives us even less credit than I thought he did.

Senator Flynn: It is contempt for the intelligence of the Senate.

Senator Smith (Colchester): After all, what could the poor British Columbia minister say when he was offered this alternative, and told, "Here is a recommendation. We hope it will mean something to you. Would you say you are satisfied with it?" What else could he say? Gracious, gracious, gracious? I don't suppose he would have done anything if the opposition and those who associated themselves with us in the debate and the vote had not pressed the matter so hard. We wouldn't have heard of any telephone calls to British Columbia, except to make excuses.

All this talk about moving the deadline leaves me utterly and completely cold, as it should everyone, because the deadline was first September 8. No one could deny that. That is the truth; that is a fact. Because there was a wish to accommodate certain other desires and provinces, or a province, that deadline was moved to November 4. We all know that. So what is the good of standing up here and trying to hornswoggle us with a story about difficulty in moving deadlines? My goodness, it's one thing to make up your mind and stick to it, and it's one thing to try to bamboozle people who can't see through what is going on, but give us a little credit for being able to see what you are doing. In any event, the honourable gentleman has absolutely no ground whatever to stand on in respect of the matter of moving deadlines, because it has been moved once already.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bird, that this bill be now read a third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Bell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Forsey, that Bill C-2 be not now read a third time but that it be amended as follows:

Page 1, clause 1: Strike out lines 11, 12 and 13—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

Senator Roblin: Please read it.

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And more than two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

MOTION THAT MESSAGE TO HOUSE OF COMMONS CONTAIN COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

[Translation]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Bourget, P.C., that the message which is to be sent to the House of Commons with Bill C-2 contain the following recommendation appearing in the report of the Senate Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, as follows:

Your Committee, however, is concerned about the effect Bill C-2 would have on certain projects that were in progress on November 4, 1978. This is the date set out in the Bill after which the Minister would no longer be able to authorize payments under the Health Resources Fund Act to the government of a province in respect of a health training facility as defined in that Act.

Your Committee is concerned that these projects will not qualify for assistance under the Act merely because the particular applications in respect of these projects were not received by the Minister prior to November 4, 1978.

Your Committee, therefore, recommends that the Government consider alternative methods of providing financial assistance in respect of any such project that, but for the cut-off date set out in the bill, would have qualified for a contribution under the Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Honourable Senator Langlois moves, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bourget, P.C.—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker:—that the message which is to be sent to the House of Commons—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt that motion?

● (1750)

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, is my honourable colleague going to explain what he is up to here?

Senator Langlois: The explanation is that my motion follows on a ruling made by Her Honour the Speaker on November 28, 1978, in connection with Bill C-5. I will read the important part of that ruling:

The point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition is that when a Commons bill is reported by a Senate committee without amendment but with recommendations and/or observations, the message to the House of Commons should include such recommendations and/or observations. It is simply a matter of custom and usage and it has never been the custom to include the recommendations and/or observations of a committee in a message to the other house with respect to the passing of a bill. In my opinion, there is no procedural barrier to the inclusion of such recommendations and/or observations in the message to the House of Commons. However, I suggest that each case should be judged on its own merit and that the Senate should decide in each instance if it is advisable and in the interest of the Senate to include the recommendations and/or observations in the message.

In conclusion, it seems to me that whenever a Commons bill is reported without amendment but with recommendations and/or observations, the Speaker, after third reading, might seek the approval of the Senate to have the recommendations and/or observations included in the message to the Commons. The Senate would then decide and it could be so ordered by the Speaker.

The purpose of my motion is to make sure that the recommendation of the committee is brought to the attention of the other place for any future action, if they so desire to take such action.

Senator Grosart: Would the deputy leader permit one question which I believe this motion raises. This is a fairly important question because of the ruling given by Her Honour that when a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and that the senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read the third time at a future date. Because of that we are put in the position, if a committee brings a report on a bill without amendment but with recommendations, of having no opportunity to debate the report. Is this an anomaly that the Rules Committee should straighten out?

Senator Langlois: This is entirely another question. This should be considered by the Rules Committee at an appropriate time. My motion does not relate at all to the point Senator Grosart has raised. We are merely adding a new custom, and I hope this precedent will be followed in the future.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate the motion my honourable colleague has just made. I think it is timely and well taken. I think it should lead to good results. However, I am also concerned about the way we deal with reports of committees in this house, because it seems that we very seldom go into Committee of the Whole. In other bodies of this kind, almost invariably there is a Committee of the Whole stage on bills that come before the house, which provides an opportunity to discuss matters of detail in a manner not possible in any other form when the Senate as such is meeting. I am concerned about reports of Senate committees.

I would like particularly to inquire of my honourable friend if he has given consideration to having the Rules Committee consider the status of the reports which are received in respect of matters which have been taken under consideration? I think we have a quite commendable practice here of referring the subject matter of a bill to a committee so that it may be considered in advance, particularly if it is a complicated bill. That sometimes is an advantage and gives us a head start in considering the substance of the bill. However, when the committee has considered the substance of the bill it produces a report. What is the status of that report? The problem that bothers me is that when that report is presented to the Senate it pre-empts, in a sense, or has a tendency to pre-empt, the position of the Senate with respect to second reading, because it deals with a bill which has never been introduced in the Senate, and a bill which the Senate has had no opportunity to debate on second reading, which is the debate on the principle of the bill.

This occurred just before Christmas in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act. In my opinion, this had a tendency to preclude the position of the Senate with respect to following the regular procedure in dealing with second reading and matters of principle.

My offhand suggestion is that the method we employ in dealing with the subject matter of a bill is good, and I am not suggesting we should give that up, but I wonder whether it would be proper to suggest that such reports be not returned to the Senate until the bill itself is before the Senate and second reading has been disposed of. If the committee report is held up until that stage, then my problem is solved. If the report comes in before the second reading of the bill, I think there is a tendency to disrupt the normal procedure and, in a sense, pre-empt the judgment of the whole Senate in favour of the verdict of the particular committee.

I commend that matter to the attention of my honourable colleague.

Senator Langlois: My honourable colleague no doubt will recall that when we had before us the Unemployment Insurance Act I made a similar observation, and I suggested that that matter be looked into by the Rules Committee. A few days after that I had a private conversation with Senator Molson, the chairman of that committee, and he agreed with me that the Rules Committee should look at this practice of pre-studying bills so that the Senate would not be precluded from discussing the principle of each bill on second reading.

Senator Roblin: I am well satisfied with that. I thank my honourable colleague.

Motion agreed to.

Re: Health Resources Fund—Submission of Project
 Form HRF6 Projects No. BC 20 & 23—Children's/Grace Hospitals

Dear Sir:

As promised at the time of my visit to your office earlier this month, I am attaching two copies of a draft of Form HRF6 relative to the above projects which we trust you will find in order. We are forwarding under separate cover a set of scale floor plans pertaining thereto.

It will be noted that the project covers only the new building at a cost of $38,875,610 in comparison to the gross cost of $48,350,000 as we have deleted the shared services portion which is to be provided by the Shaughnessy Hospital in conjunction with other hospitals. We are also attaching a summary showing the deductions made. It was felt this was perhaps the best approach as either way would not present a situation which would normally be found in a complete project. It was also considered that the funds remaining in the Health Resources Fund would be depleted with the reduced cost.

As requested, we have included information (page 1, Item 4(a-e) showing the estimated cash flow required for this project up to mid 1980, with allowance for the 10 per cent final payment in subsequent years. It will be noted we have only shown a total cash flow of $9,000,000 as the Fund will be exhausted before the completion of the project.

We are anxious to commence preparing a claim for work already completed and regret the delay in making this submission and look forward to your acceptance so that a formal submission can be forwarded for approval by your Minister.

We will be pleased to answer any further queries you may have with respect to this project.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION—STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT LEADER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the statement by the Leader of the Government yesterday in connection with his telephone conversation or conversations—I don't know which—with Dr. McGeer about the fact that the Government of British Columbia was entirely satisfied with the recommendation attached to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science with regard to Bill C-2.

I took the advice of the Leader of the Government, and I phoned Dr. McGeer this morning to inquire about what exactly took place. Dr. McGeer told me very clearly that he took for granted that the Senate had no alternative but to attach that recommendation and that it could do nothing else.

It is obvious then, under those circumstances, why Dr. McGeer should say: If you cannot do anything else, I would rather see a recommendation than nothing at all.

I checked the Debates of the Senate of yesterday because we pounded the Leader of the Government with questions as to the exact tenor of his conversation with the minister from British Columbia. When we were discussing Senator Bell's amendment, an amendment to which nobody objected—I am quite sure that it was in order—Senator Perrault is reported as having said at page 707 of Hansard:

If the honourable senator wishes to make his own telephone calls, I am sure Bell Canada is always available for the tariff, but I want him to know that, as candidly and as objectively as possible, I have set forth the alternatives for the honourable provincial minister, whom I have known for a great many years.

I have also pointed out the fact that the opposition pursued with great vigour today, as is their right, a request that the Province of British Columbia appear before the Senate committee. I said, "These are the alternatives before me as Leader of the Senate—

"Leader of the Senate" here means one who follows only the instructions of the government. He continues:

I said, "These are the alternatives before me as Leader of the Senate, and these are the alternatives before the Senate." The minister replied, "In view of the Senate recommendation, I see no necessity at this time for the Province of British Columbia to come."

Of course, it is obvious that you told the minister that there was nothing else the Senate could do but make a recommendation and that there was no necessity for him to attend. At that time the amendment by Senator Bell had been put and nobody objected to the amendment as far as its regularity was concerned. This alternative was not put to the provincial minister, Dr. McGeer. I believe the Senate was misled by the statements made by the Leader of the Government yesterday. It may have been a good argument to rally his troops, but this is not the way a matter of this kind should be dealt with in the Senate. I suggest that the Leader of the Government should apologize to the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, I think that there is only limited value in exchanging comments about the real or alleged contents of telephone calls.

Senator Flynn: It was your idea.

Senator Perrault: However, I recall that yesterday the Leader of the Opposition was very vehement in expressing his desire that he might have been with me when that call to Dr. McGeer was made. His view then was that he would have appreciated an invitation to have been with me when the call was made. Certainly, he expressed doubt about the authenticity of what I said. I am rather surprised, then, in view of the attitude he took yesterday, that he did not invite me into his office this morning so that we could place a joint call to the Honourable Patrick McGeer. That would have been the ultimate gesture to establish the bona fides of the Leader of the Opposition in his expressed earnest quest for truth.

Senator Flynn: I say that you misled the Senate.

Senator Perrault: However, that was not the object of the action by the Leader of the Opposition, who is engaged again in one of his well-travelled political ploys.

Senator Flynn: Don't be silly.

Senator Perrault: The fact is that this is a rather transparent political strategy—

Senator Flynn: Nonsense.

Senator Perrault: —as a result of some of the unhappy experiences, as far as the Leader of the Opposition is concerned, of yesterday. There was no suggestion today—no call received at my office that he would like to have a joint call placed to the Minister of Education of British Columbia.

Senator Flynn: Why should I? You did not invite me yesterday.

Senator Perrault: I can only tell honourable senators that I made extensive notes of my conversation, and I only read into the record of the Senate those words which were spoken to me by the Honourable Patrick McGeer.

Senator Flynn: I took your words for granted.

Senator Perrault: I should like to suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that he is quite aware of the fact that had the amendment proposed by our esteemed colleague, Senator Bell, been adopted yesterday, it would have negated the whole or much of the program of restraint.

Honourable senators, it really does not become the Leader of the Opposition, in the responsible position he holds, to attempt to drag his rather tattered red herring across the trail this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: I still maintain that you misled the Senate, and you have not denied it; you spoke about something else.

Senator Perrault: That is a vicious canard.

Senator Flynn: It is not a vicious canard; it is the simple truth.

Senator Smith (Colchester): Honourable senators, it is pretty hard to refrain from pointing out that what happened yesterday was exactly what those of us on this side said had happened after listening to the honourable gentleman. It was a transparent, inexcusable and completely unjustifiable attempt to use a telephone call made in the heat of embarrassment in an endeavour to salvage something out of the problem in which somehow or other—whether by his fault or somebody else's—the Leader of the Government found himself.

Senator Perrault: Did you make a telephone call too?

Senator Smith (Colchester): I could have if I had wanted to, but I didn't have to. I believed you and I believe the Leader of the Opposition. As for the nonsense about complaining that he was not invited to attend when the Leader of the Opposition made his call, how can the Leader of the Government have the ineffable brass to suggest that the Leader of the Opposition, after he had been spurned, should heap coals of fire on his head by saying, "Look, you didn't bother asking me to come and listen to your phone call, but I should be a doubly good fellow and not pay any attention to your mean example and ask you to attend with me." That extraordinary conduct, and that most extraordinary effort to avoid the proper and well-justified demand for an apology, is conduct that only adds insult to injury and bad to worse.

• (1410)

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I don't know that I need prolong this debate, but yesterday afternoon, having listened to much of the debate for some time, I was called on the long-distance telephone—it was not a conversation with Dr. McGeer—and missed the vote. However, a few minutes after that I was talking to Dr. McGeer on an entirely different matter that he and I had been working on for some weeks relative to a British Columbia problem with the federal government. His call came through just about that time and I mentioned to him, after we had finished discussing our other subject, that there was a spirited debate going on in the Senate chamber on Bill C-2, which I knew he was interested in. As I was not phoning him in direct relationship to this matter I was not taking careful notes, but I can say without qualification that, while Dr. McGeer may be critical of the minister, and may be critical of the government, and may be critical of the manner in which, from their point of view, this money has not been forthcoming to them, he was most complimentary about the Senate. He said that the Senate had done all it could do and that he was perfectly happy with it. I just thought I might mention that to honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: You can mention all you like, but you have missed the point. Dr. McGeer was satisfied with what we did only because Senator Perrault said that the Senate could not do anything else but attach that recommendation. That is the point.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, you don't know what I said in that conversation.

Senator Flynn: I know what you reported to us of your conversation.

Senator Perrault: Unless you are tapping my telephone you don't know what was said.

Senator Flynn: I have your words here in Hansard.

Senator Perrault: Don't be so excited about this issue.

Senator Flynn: Yesterday you said you set forth "the alternatives for the Senate and for me." The alternatives should have included the amendment, and Dr. McGeer said that you never mentioned that; he took it for granted that the Senate had no power to amend the bill.

Senator Perrault: If you had listened to the conversation you would have been very edified by the description of the legislation given to the Honourable Patrick McGeer.

Senator Flynn: I doubt it.

Senator Perrault: I know that the result of the vote yesterday must rankle with the Leader of the Opposition, but he really is not distinguishing himself with this kind of petty verbal barrage.

Senator Flynn: In your company it is not very difficult to distinguish oneself.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, and I ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of today to form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Clerk: (Reading:)

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, were referred—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

[For text of report see appendix page 727.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Everett: With leave of the Senate, now. By way of explanation, I am requesting leave to explain what is in the report now because I will be unable to be in the Senate next week. I have to appear as a witness in a court case.

Senator Flynn: As a witness only?

Senator Everett: Just as a witness. I am glad to see your mood has lightened.

Senator Flynn: Well, I have no problem with you.

Senator Everett: I am delighted to hear that.

The report, of course, would remain on the order paper and would be the subject of debate by other honourable senators. However, by being able to proceed this afternoon, I would not be the author of any delay when the appropriation bill comes down.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, the chairman of the committee did discuss this with me in the committee this morning. I appreciate why he is asking for this rather unusual leave under our rules. As he has pointed out, it is impossible for him to be here next week. It therefore seems reasonable to me that he give the Senate a rundown, an explanation, of the report this afternoon. The report of the committee is now being distributed to honourable senators, and we will have an opportunity to read it.

Senator Flynn: Do you wish to have it placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration as the first order, or do you wish to proceed with it right now?

Senator Everett: If by going ahead now I would be interfering in any way with the normal business of the house, I would be quite happy to proceed later this day.

Senator Flynn: If you don't have to leave right away, I would suggest that consideration of the report be placed on the Orders of the Day as the first order.

Senator Everett: That is fine.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am not opposing leave being granted to proceed in this way, but I should like to put a question to the honourable senator.

Is it not a fact that under parliamentary rules the attendance of honourable senators in the Senate takes precedence over any other matter? I think the honourable senator could plead that, and we could have his attendance next week, if he so wished.

● (1420)

Senator Everett: The honourable senator raises an interesting point. It had never occurred to me that that was possible. I do not want to be responsible for slowing down the administration of justice, but I will most certainly take into account the point made by the honourable senator.

Senator Grosart: You could try to get your attendance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, March 14, 1979, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, March 12, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Honourable senators, when we return on Monday evening we expect to have two bills from the House of Commons. They are Bill C-28, to amend the Northwest Territories Act, and Bill C-35, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

I am informed that Bill C-9, the Canada Referendum Act, and Bill C-42, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979, will be reported from the committee in the other place and that we shall probably receive those bills early next week. We will also be dealing with the items now on the order paper.

[Senator Everett.]

The committee schedule for next week is as follows: On Tuesday the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution will hold an in camera meeting at 10.30 a.m. The Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies will meet at 2 p.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet at 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-9, the Canada Referendum Act, and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will also meet at 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-42, the Energy Supplies Emergency Act, 1979. On the same day, at 8 p.m., the subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will sit to consider its study of off-track betting. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 8.30 p.m. on the same day.

On Wednesday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. and 2.30 p.m. on the subject matter of Bill C-38, to amend the Excise Tax Act; and the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet when the Senate rises to consider Bill S-13, the Beef Import Bill.

On Thursday the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet at 9.30 a.m. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture will meet at 9.30 a.m. and when the Senate rises on Bill S-13. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet at 11 a.m.

There will, of course, be additions to this list as the week progresses and other bills are referred.

Senator Flynn: Is it intended that the Senate will sit Tuesday afternoon?

Senator Langlois: No, Tuesday evening.

Senator Flynn: Is there any program scheduled for next Friday?

Senator Langlois: Not so far.

Senator Riley: Did I understand you to say that the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is meeting next Tuesday morning as well as Thursday morning?

Senator Langlois: No, Tuesday evening at 8.30 and Thursday morning at 11.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH RESOURCES FUND ACT

TELEGRAM FROM HON. PATRICK McGEER, MINISTER OF EDUCATION, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, BRITISH COLUMBIA—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he has received the announced telegram from Dr. Pat McGeer. If so, would he either inform us of its contents or table it?

Senator Perrault: I have not received the communication as yet from the esteemed Dr. McGeer. I still eagerly await its arrival.

Senator Phillips: Did you telephone him?

Senator Grosart: It was not sent by post this time.

IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT OF THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE—QUESTION

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has the Government of Canada accepted and implemented the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science on Bill C-2?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as yet I do not know whether my colleagues have had the opportunity to study the recommendations and advice tendered by the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Do you mean you did not read the report?

Senator Perrault: We are talking about the other place now. We are talking about members of the government in the other place.

Senator Flynn: No, we are talking about the recommendation.

Senator Phillips: We are talking about the recommendation to the Governor in Council.

Senator Perrault: I have no idea whether the report has been studied as yet by the appropriate ministers. I do know that a conscientious study of it will take place.

Senator Phillips: I will ask the same question next week.

AIR CANADA

CHANGE OF LONDON, ENGLAND, TERMINUS FROM HEATHROW TO GATWICK—QUESTION

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question which, surprisingly enough, does not deal with Bill C-2.

Relative to the good work the Canadian High Commissioner to the Court of St. James is doing on behalf of Air Canada in respect of its changing its London terminus from Heathrow to Gatwick, can he tell us if there are other Canadian airlines involved, such as the charter services of CP Air and Wardair, or is this simply a negotiation with the regularly scheduled Canadian airlines? I should like to know, because I believe Air Canada is the only Canadian scheduled airline flying into London.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, negotiations have been under way for some time on this matter, which is of interest to all of us, but I will take the question as notice and attempt to obtain an updated report on the situation.

PARLIAMENT

OFFICIAL REPORT (HANSARD)—PRICE INCREASE—QUESTION

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, on February 28 the Leader of the Opposition asked the government leader a question in respect of the reported increase in the subscription costs of Hansard to the general public. Senator Langlois replied that "those inquiries concerning the alleged increase in the price of Hansard were made as a result of an apparently unfounded article published in the Ottawa Citizen last week." He went on to say:

● (1430)

However, following the question of my friend, I am ready to make further inquiries and if I learn something new, I will be pleased to advise this house.

I have received some complaints, and am wondering whether the Leader of the Government has received any further information on this alleged increase, and if so whether he could report it to this chamber.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the information which I have been provided with for today's question period does not include material on that subject. However, further inquiries will go forward immediately.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

NATIONAL TELEVISION COVERAGE OF CANADA WINTER GAMES—QUESTION

Senator Lewis: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government with reference to the Canada Winter Games held recently at Brandon.

What was the extent of the broadcast coverage of the Games provided by the CBC; what was the cost of this coverage; and how did this coverage and its cost compare with the coverage and the cost of the coverage provided for the Summer Games at St. John's in 1977, and the Commonwealth Games at Edmonton in 1978? Finally, did the CBC have an exclusive right to the broadcast coverage of the Winter Games?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a number of senators have complained about what they feel to be the inadequate coverage of the Canada Winter Games at Brandon, which were a great success. As a result, I have inquiries under way at the present time.

In a preliminary way, I can say that the CBC broadcast the opening of the Games only after being assured of payment for the time by Loto Canada. To certain honourable senators that may be a surprising situation. However, I want to authenticate that allegation, and also to bring a body of other information to the Senate on what is a most important question.

THE ECONOMY

CANADIAN BALANCE OF PAYMENTS—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked about the trade surplus for the month of January. As I am sure honourable senators will rejoice in recalling, the amount has zoomed to $386 million.

Senator Manning asked about the balance of payments account and whether the deficit is still increasing or stabilizing. I am advised that as of the end of 1978 the current account deficit was $5.285 billion.

Due to the complexity of the accounting system it is not possible to answer whether the deficit is still increasing or stabilizing at present. However, it is the view among most forecasters that the situation on that front will improve over the next year. For example, the trade surplus for 1978 set a record—$3.5 billion over $2.9 billion in 1977, and there are signs that the travel account is improving as the exchange rate depreciation is bringing more visitors to Canada.

So, it is good to note that on the economic front there are marked improvements in the Canadian economy.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a couple of questions with respect to the statement we have just heard, because I think that my honourable friend, no doubt unwittingly, has really not conveyed the correct impression with respect to the balance of payments and the Canadian economy.

In the forecasts that were put forward for the year 1978 we were told that the deficit would be $4.5 billion. It is now $5.29 billion, and my honourable friend might well have told us that this is the highest deficit in the balance of trade that we have ever had in the history of the country. I am one of those who are pleased to see that the merchandise balance is improving and, God knows, it needs to, but what is happening in this country is that the service deficit is increasing, and the fact that we are having such a difficult problem with our balance of trade can certainly be attributed, at least in part, to the service deficit in the balance of trade.

I would like to ask my honourable friend if he would please tell the house how much has been added to the service deficit by the operations of the Government of Canada in borrowing some $6 billion in the last fiscal year in foreign markets, because, as my honourable friend will realize, that seems to be one of the main reasons why our balance of trade figures are so bad. I would like to know how much the "clean" float the government is operating in respect of the Canadian dollar is costing us in terms of our balance of trade.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this kind of question is rather characteristic of the official opposition in this country. The official opposition seems almost to revel in discussing at great length the problems which they allege exist in the Canadian economy.

Senator Flynn: Why not? What do you want us to do?

Senator Perrault: If we had half a container of liquid, they would say it was half empty, and a Liberal would say that it was half full.

Senator Flynn: A Liberal in office?

Senator Perrault: They seem to take great joy in trying to destroy confidence in the country at a time when it is emerging from its economic difficulties.

Senator Flynn: Oh, come on! Answer the question.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: We have the former Premier of Manitoba, who was a well-known figure among the denizens of Wall Street when he went there as premier to borrow substantial amounts of money on behalf of the Province of Manitoba, now complaining about the federal government's foreign borrowings. His entire record as Premier of Manitoba displays a great tendency to do all of Manitoba's borrowings, or almost all of them, down on Wall Street and abroad, which market he now infers is somehow unclean as far as the present federal government is concerned.

Senator Flynn: Order! Order!

Senator Perrault: I shall be pleased to bring this additional information before the Senate.

The Leader of the Opposition is uncommonly vocal these days, to the extent that I almost expect him to announce he is going to run in one of those winnable 60 Quebec constituencies that his leader talks about with such euphoria.

Senator Flynn: I would be as lucky as you would be in British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: I nevertheless warn the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: Warn me if you want, but stick to the question.

Senator Perrault: How can you ever ingest wisdom if you continually talk?

Senator Flynn: Well said!

Senator Perrault: The point is, I happen to have the floor, and you are the one who is interrupting.

Senator Flynn: And you are talking!

Senator Perrault: I must warn the official opposition that when the facts are made known, no doubt to their great dismay, about the increase in the service debt, there will be great hope to be derived from even those figures that improvements are taking place and that Canadians should take great heart from our economic performance.

Senator Roblin: I know my honourable friend will expect me to respond to his interesting challenge, and I know he will not overlook the fact that it is our current account deficit that is the principal reason for the state of the Canadian dollar. I know the Leader of the Government is a master of irrelevancies, as my honourable colleague the Leader of the Opposition so accurately described him, and I want to congratulate him for having done such an excellent job of introducing irrelevancies this afternoon.

I do not usually respond to his parish pump approach to politics, as exemplified in his remarks about what happened in Manitoba from time to time, but he should get some of his information correct. As leader of the Government of Manitoba, I never borrowed a five-cent piece for the Government of Manitoba on Wall Street, or any place else, as far as that goes. I must correct that. We did borrow money with respect to the Canada Pension Fund, though not on Wall Street and not for the Government of Manitoba.

● (1440)

The Manitoba Hydro Electric Commission borrowed on Wall Street, yes, but that is an economic operation, and that borrowing has nothing to do with the kind of borrowing that my honourable friend has to apologize for in this house. He has to apologize for the money he is borrowing to support the Canadian dollar.

Senator Grosart: Why don't you withdraw the statement?

Senator Roblin: You get yourself on a circular argument here, and my honourable friend is well impaled on it, if that is not a mixture of metaphors. All I wish to say is that it is quite obvious that he does not intend to answer the question in any intelligible fashion, and I suppose that is his right.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in my usual conscientious fashion, that information will be sought and brought to the Senate.

The honourable senator has never complained in the past, and he has had no reason to complain, about a lack of information or a lack of a forthcoming attitude on the part of the government in the Senate.

Senator Roblin: That I have to describe, honourable senators, as a matter of opinion, because when we sit on this side of the house and we listen to the flim-flam to which we are treated by the Leader of the Government here—

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Roblin: If "flim-flam" is unparliamentary, I shall be pleased to withdraw it. I have a few more adjectives that I could employ in this connection, but they serve no purpose. I only want to say to my honourable friend that I admire his dexterity in dodging the questions he does not care to answer.

REDUCTIONS—GROS MORNE NATIONAL PARK—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 13—By Senator Marshall:

With reference to Indian and Northern Affairs News Release 1-7828 (Annex) Reductions, what are the details of those reductions with respect to the Gros Morne National Park and what is their effect thereon of the following:

- (a) 1978-79 Parks Canada reduction of $5 million.
- (b) 1978-79 Northern Roads reduction of $2 million.
- (c) 1979-80 Parks Canada Capital reduction of $12 million, and
- (d) 1979-80 Parks Canada Operating reductions, mainly staff at headquarters and at regional offices, of $1 million?

Reply by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development:

Regardless of this budget cut, anticipated expenditures on all Highway 430 contracts during 1978-79 are estimated to reach $3.7 million as compared to $3.2 million planned in the current year Estimates.

(b) No impact on Gros Morne.

(c) No impact on Gros Morne.

LOANS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES APPROVED BY EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—QUESTION ON THE ORDER PAPER ANSWERED

Question No. 33—By Senator Marshall:

1. What are the individual amounts that comprise a loan, which was approved by the Export Development Corporation, of $2.57 billion to (a) Argentina, (b) Hong Kong, (c) Iran, (d) Ivory Coast, (e) Panama, (f) Poland, (g) Romania, (h) Senegal, (i) Spain, (j) Yugoslavia?

2. What are the details of each loan?

Reply by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce:

It is regretted that Export Development Corporation is unable to ascertain precisely what is desired.

There was no EDC loan of $2.57 billion, and if individual loans, which in the aggregate reach that figure are intended, EDC has been unable to identify them. A period or year is not mentioned, but if recent years are intended, copies of the Corporation's Annual Reports could be sent. They would be informative since each loan made in the year is listed in the report for that year, with particulars. The reports are all tabled.

THE ESTIMATES

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance with respect to the supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979.

Senator Everett moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I learned years ago in the study of economics not to get into a discussion or argument about the balance of payments. If Senator Roblin were the Leader of the Government, I would have to ask him a question, because I would be constrained to want to know how you can be "impaired on a circular argument."

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can say that it is a very difficult achievement, but my honourable friend the Leader of the Government does it often.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, before we agree to this motion, I should like to know, once again, whether the report being presented today is in the two official languages of this country. May I be told whether it is or not?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, it is in the two official languages, although I did not have a copy in the French language to table at the time I rose. It will be in the two official languages, and a copy will be available to the honourable senator.

Honourable senators, before I go through the supplementary estimates (B) with you, I would thank Senator Grosart for intervening on my behalf when I asked to be heard at this time. I would also go a little further and thank Senator Grosart, as I think all members of the committee would, for being a member of this committee. His experience in the operation of government, and especially in the work of Treasury Board in controlling expenditures, is probably unparalleled in Parliament.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: Time and again the witnesses from Treasury Board come before the committee and go away saying how pleased they are to have been there, and how germane the questions were. Very often the discussion has been led by Senator Grosart.

Honourable senators, we are dealing with supplementary estimates (B) for the year ending March 31, 1979, and this completes the 1978-1979 fiscal year. The supplementary expenditures total $346 million, of which $249 million constitutes budgetary expenditures and $97 million constitutes loans, investments and advances.

This brings the total spending estimates for the fiscal year, which will be completed at the end of this month, to $50.138 billion. However, when you take into account loan repayments and normal lapses of spending, you find that the total spending for the fiscal year is $48.3 billion, which is within the ceiling that the government imposed upon itself at the beginning of the year.

Attached to the estimates is a list of $1 items. As you know, the committee, in the past, has been particularly interested in $1 items which amend legislation. We have to commend the Treasury Board on reducing the number of such items, but we are still concerned about the appearance of any in the estimates. The main cause of our concern is that these $1 items which amend legislation very often do not appear in the Statutes of Canada and, therefore, people or their lawyers seeking information are often unable to find, by going to the Statutes of Canada or the Revised Statutes of Canada, the current state of the law.

At our request, Treasury Board is going to conduct a study to see if there is some other way of introducing such minor legislation other than through $1 items in the supplementary estimates. One thing they will look at is whether or not there could be introduced each year, or even more often, an omnibus bill to deal with these minor legislative items, a bill which would receive three readings and perhaps committee study in each of the houses.

The committee is also concerned with $1 items which are delays of capital expenditures. The committee has objected to that procedure. What happens is that capital expenditures which were to have been made in the current fiscal year are delayed into a subsequent fiscal year because the capital project is not moving as quickly as Treasury Board or the government thought it would. Instead of the saving being taken back as a reduction in the total estimates, it is used on a current expenditure.

Treasury Board is going to give us a table which will be part of the documentation of $1 items, and which will be attached to future reports, setting out separately the capital expenditures that are delayed, and showing where the funds are used to finance current expenditures.

Another item the report deals with is the question of writing off bad debts. At the present time all bad debts in excess of $5,000 can only be written off with approval sought under estimates or supplementary estimates. This is a limit that has obviously been exceeded by the size of government spending and by inflation generally. The committee asked officials of the Treasury Board to study the matter, and make a recommendation which would raise that limit and provide that write-offs of whatever size are shown in the public accounts.

Finally, honourable senators, the committee dealt with the question of grants and contributions. It will be realized that grants are payments made to organizations which the government does not audit subsequently, whereas contributions are payments that are made subject to a satisfactory government audit. The committee has been concerned about the situation concerning grants for the very reason that they are not audited. We have asked officials of the Treasury Board to look into the possibility of showing in the Public Accounts each year a list of all grants, their recipients, the amounts and the objectives of the expenditures. Officials of the Treasury Board have also agreed to study the matter of grants to see whether it would be possible to have the recipient of the grant at least verify that the money was used for the purposes for which it was given. That would not involve an audit, but it would involve verification of some sort by the recipient of the grant.

I have tried to be brief because I know I am out of turn, but before sitting down I should like to say one further thing. Two or three years ago the government set annual spending limits. This is something our committee requested over many years. We were delighted to see it done. Honourable senators know that I have been critical of the government in the past over the matter of spending, but I was pleased, as was the committee, to see that the government set limits. I am more than pleased to find that the government, in this fiscal year, has been able to contain its spending within the limit of $48 billion. In the context of previous criticism, I say to the government—and I hope this will be conveyed to the cabinet by the Leader of the Government in the Senate—that I and other committee members congratulate them for their greater control over expenditures.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

BANKS AND BANKING LAW REVISION

AUTHORITY TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE REPORTS OF THE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Hayden:

That the honourable senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments be authorized to publish and distribute the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-15, intituled: "An Act to revise the Bank Act, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act and the Bank of Canada Act, to establish the Canadian Payments Association and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof".

Senator Flynn: What I have to say is rather brief.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: The applause seems to suggest that I make long speeches. I think I am more relevant than the Leader of the Government is, generally speaking.

These remarks apply to this order and the one following. They have the same wording and have the same effect. I adjourned the debate because I wanted to consider the implications of these motions. I do not object to them for two reasons.

First, they probably will be of no effect because my understanding is that the reports will be tabled next week. The motions were probably presented in the perspective of a dissolution of Parliament this weekend, a perspective that has disappeared.

Secondly, there is the problem of giving the authority to the special committee—which is formed as a matter of practice and not as a matter of law—to deal with problems of internal economy between Parliaments and between sessions, but especially between Parliaments because the state of Parliament is rather in limbo then and we do not know exactly what we can or cannot do. One sure thing is that no committee of the Senate can meet between Parliaments.

I have deplored this on previous occasions. As Senator Hayden mentioned, I moved a motion in 1972 to try to ameliorate the plight of the Science Policy Committee. That committee was unable to continue with its meetings as a committee between Parliaments. It could do some work, but not on an official basis and not as efficiently as it could if the committee had been able to meet.

The problem remains, but until we find a solution there is no difficulty in using this technique regardless of whether it is entirely correct.

For those reasons, I have no objection to the motion being adopted.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

AUTHORITY TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE REPORT OF THE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Hayden:

That the honourable senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments be authorized to publish and distribute the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-37, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax, to amend the Canada Pension Plan and to provide other authority for the raising of funds".

Senator Flynn: For the same reasons, I have no objection to the motion being adopted.

Motion agreed to.

COMPUTER AND TELECOMMUNICATION TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Florence B. Bird rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 1, 1979:

That she will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of appointing, at the next Session of Parliament, a Special Committee of the Senate to inquire into and report upon the impact of the combination of computer and telecommunication technology, and the ways the concept of a "wired society" affects Canadians.

She said: Honourable senators, this is not a matter concerning petty parish pump politics, but a political matter of importance to every Canadian. We, in this chamber, will sooner or later be faced with making momentous decisions concerning legislation dealing with the authority of the federal government and that of the provinces in regard to telecommunications.

As you know, the Honourable Jeanne Sauvé has appointed a committee of 10 knowledgeable men under the chairmanship of the Honourable John V. Clyne. It has been asked to make specific recommendations on "a strategy to restructure the Canadian telecommunications system in order to contribute more effectively to the safeguarding of Canada's sovereignty". Its report will be based on an examination of studies and reports made for the Department of Communications.

● (1500)

There has been some discussion in the other place about the possibility of setting up a royal commission to examine the dangers and the benefits involved in the new computer and telecommunications technology. I think that this is an area which can and should be examined by a special committee of the Senate, rather than by a royal commission.

The Clyne Committee has worked from documents only; it did not hold public hearings. I think that public hearings should be held so that people in every part of Canada may become fully aware of the impact of this new technology. Furthermore, it is our duty, as legislators, to understand fully the potential of this new field of electronics. We can do that only by holding public hearings.

Some years ago I first became aware of the way telecommunications may drastically change the quality of life in this country. At that time the Royal Society of Canada sponsored a symposium called "Communications in the Home", and I was asked to be one of the speakers. The research required to prepare a serious hour-long paper was, for me, a mind-expanding experience. I had read Toffler's Future Shock, and was indeed shocked to realize that inevitably, in one way or another, every aspect of our lives will be affected.

This electronic phase of the industrial revolution forces on us in this chamber an obligation to bring together the best minds in the country and to publicize their thinking.

Here in Canada we have the ability and the know-how required to produce the hardware for vast, far-reaching computer and telecommunications technology. It is the software which should concern us. In other words, how do we use this extraordinary ability?

The time to act is now. I must remind you of what happened in other areas when we thought complacently only about the today instead of the tomorrow.

We are now spending millions of dollars to try, in some small degree, to cleanse the pollution of our wonderful rivers and lakes—pollution which could have been prevented and which now is doing so much harm to public health and to the enjoyment of our environment. We have also allowed the air we breathe to be poisoned. In some places even the gentle rain from heaven is no longer pure. We have allowed television, a tremendous potential for education, to become a source of pollution of the mind. It has done great harm to our children by advertising violence and by exploiting man's inhumanity to man.

The new telecommunications technology has incredible potential for good and for evil. It raises many issues which go beyond the terms of reference of the Clyne Committee. It involves not only our national sovereignty but our relations with the provinces and with the private sector. It is really a question of whether we are to control it or be controlled by it.

Honourable senators, I do not apologize for taking your time when the pressure of work is so heavy. I have raised the subject now because I hope that before we come back, after the election, we will have had a chance to study the Clyne report. Presumably the report will be made public by the government, even if it cannot be tabled should Parliament be dissolved before it comes out.

I also hope that we will be able to read a book called The Wired Society—A Challenge for Tomorrow, by James Martin. It emphasizes the extent to which our society will be affected. James Martin is a graduate of Oxford University and at present is a Visiting Fellow at Lancaster University. He is an authority on computers and has written 12 books. Another book of his is entitled Security, Accuracy and Privacy in Computer Systems. We might try to get hold of it, since we will have to concern ourselves with the privacy of individuals as well as with the protection of classified government information.

During the summer we might think about adequate, far-reaching terms of reference for what could be an important, historic committee. If the Senate appoints such a committee, it could make a valuable contribution to our society.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE
ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates "B" laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, were referred has in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, March 5, 1979, examined the said Supplementary Estimates "B" and submits its report as follows:

(1) In obedience to the foregoing, the committee made a general examination of the Supplementary Estimates "B" and heard evidence from Miss Denise Moncion, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch, Treasury Board; Mr. E. A. Radburn, Director, Estimates Division, Program Branch; Mr. E. R. Stimpson, Director, Expenditure Analysis Division.

(2) These Supplementary Estimates "B" total $346 million. The budgetary expenditures total $249 million of which $35 million are statutory items and $214 million represent funds for which Parliament is being asked to provide new authority. The non-budgetary expenses, that is to say loans, investments, and advances include $97 million to be voted. The total estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, are now increased to $50,138 million. After allowing for loan repayments and normal and directed lapses of authorized funding, the final total spending of the federal government is expected to be within the announced ceiling of $48,300 million.

(3) Of the $311 million in these Supplementary Estimates which are to be voted by Parliament, some of the major items are:

- $59 million for the Department of National Defence to cover increases in its operating and capital budgets and in contributions to NATO
- $41 million for the stabilization of agricultural products
- $35 million for the purchase of shares of Nordair Ltd. by the government
- $33 million for payments to the Province of Quebec with respect to adjusted estimates of that province's spending on hospital insurance during the period 1974 to 1977. Such payments were made under Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act before it was repealed. Hospital insurance payments to all provinces since 1977-78 have been made under the new established programs financing arrangements.

The revisions to statutory programs amount to a net increase of $35 million and include:

- $77 million for increased contributions to provincial and territorial governments for hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education. This includes increased payments to be made under the current established programs financing arrangements as well as a downward revision to the forecast of amounts required this year to settle federal obligations under previous legislation for post-secondary education

- $125 million for additional costs of servicing the public debt
- $43 million in increased old age security and income supplement payments to our older citizens. The increase results from the enrichment of this program, effective January 1, 1979, whereby an additional $20 has been added to the monthly payment made to GIS recipients
- A $174 million reduction, which partially offsets the above increases, in Family Allowance payments. This reduction reflects the lowering of the basic federal Family Allowance payment to $20 per child per month as of January 1, 1979, which constituted part of the restructuring of the child benefits system announced by the government in August.

(4) The committee commends the government for the continuing decline in the use of dollar votes to amend legislation. However the major problem still persists. Whenever a dollar vote is used in this way there is the possibility that the resultant legislative change will not be reflected in the Consolidated Statutes. Hence the practice of law in Canada is thereby impaired; e.g. individuals may be incorrectly informed about their entitlement to benefits.

The committee suggests that a study be conducted by the Treasury Board and submitted to the Committee which assesses alternative means of remedying this fundamental weakness. Included amongst the alternatives should be an assessment of the strengths and weaknesses of using an act to amend acts in lieu of dollar votes.

(5) The Treasury Board supplied the Committee with a list explaining the $1 items in the Supplementary Estimates "B", which is attached as Appendix A. The committee reiterates its objection to the practice of using funds unexpended as a result of delays in capital projects to meet operating expenses via $1 items.

(6) In the past the committee has objected to the lack of distinction in the estimates between those $1 items which are in reality only delayed expenditures and those which represent termination of expenditures. The committee is therefore pleased with the Treasury Board's agreement to henceforth provide a table which shows separately delayed and terminated items.

(7) The committee suggests for consideration that the limit of $5,000 on bad debt write-offs be reviewed and that amounts below these limits not be shown in the estimates provided the information is displayed in the Public Accounts.

(8) The committee suggests, for the consideration of the Comptroller General, that consideration be given to displaying in the Public Accounts information which shows by recipient, the number of grants and their amounts and objects.

(9) The committee heard substantial evidence on the subject of grants and contributions. As indicated in this evidence, while contributions are subject to audit by the government, grants are not. However, the committee was informed that some departments require grant recipients to file a statement which is used in the assessment of future grant applications.

The committee requested and the Treasury Board agreed to prepare and table a discussion paper containing at least:

- a description of the grants and contribution process
- an assessment of the costs and benefits of requiring grant recipients to file a verification of the expenditure of the grant.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. Everett,

Chairman.

ADDITIONAL EXPLANATIONS

CATEGORY D

Energy, Mines and Resources—Eldorado Nuclear Limited

Vote L85b—To increase from $30 million to $40 million the amount that the Corporation may borrow for capital expenditures by the issue and sale of securities.

Explanation—The Corporation was authorized in 1976-77 through an item in Supplementary Estimates to borrow $40 million from the private market for capital purposes. This authority has since been fully utilized. The Corporation was given authority to borrow a further $30 million through the 1977-78 Supplementary Estimates. This authority was not utilized because of delays in the capital program. The 1979 requirements are forecast at $40 million, and it is proposed to increase the last authority by $10 million.

Regional Economic Expansion

Vote L16b—To amend the existing authority of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration Working Capital Advance Account to finance expenses in respect of the South Saskatchewan River Project.

Explanation—The Working Capital Advance Account was established in 1974-75 through Estimates to:

(a) authorize advances made for the purposes of financing the recoverable portions of the costs of projects constructed by the Department on behalf of a province or a municipality and

(b) credit amounts repaid by a province or a municipality in respect of advances made for recoverable projects under paragraph (a).

This authority does not permit the financing and recovery of operating and maintenance expenses. Authority is therefore requested to permit the charging of operating and maintenance expenses incurred in respect of the South Saskatchewan River Project and the crediting to the account of any monies recovered from the Province of Saskatchewan on behalf of the Project.

CATEGORY E

Solicitor General

Vote 5b—To authorize the inclusion of two former penitentiary officers under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act for pension purposes.

Explanation—The families of two deceased penitentiary officers who were killed while on duty are presently receiving pensions under the Government Employees Compensation Act. Authority is requested to now declare, for pension purposes, that prior to their death the two officers were included under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act. The inclusion of the officers under this Act will provide for increased pensions to their families because the present pensions are not sufficient to meet the full responsibility of the Crown as employer. Provision has been made to ensure double payment of pensions does not occur.

Similar authority was sought in 1964-65 (Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B)), in 1975-76 (Supplementary Estimates (A)) and 1978-79 (Supplementary Estimates (A)) for other officers killed while on duty.

THE SENATE

Monday, March 12, 1979

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Hon. Maurice Bourget, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

Prayers.

RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS
MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Duquet had been substituted for that of Mr. Stewart (Cochrane) on the list of members appointed to serve on the Standing Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION BILL, 1979

COMMONS MESSAGE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-6, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, 1979

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-35, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Senator Perrault: With leave, I move, seconded by Senator Langlois, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, before the question is put, perhaps the Leader of the Government could indicate whether there is some urgency in connection with the passage of this bill through the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the word to describe it would not be "urgency." It is, however, a non-controversial matter, and because more controversial measures may be coming before the Senate in the near future, the feeling is that it might be useful, with the co-operation of the official opposition, to deal as soon as possible with this particular measure.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of correspondence, dated November 9, 1978 and January 26, 1979, between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Prince Edward Island concerning the publicity arrangements for the respective contribution towards shared-cost programs and certain joint activities in Prince Edward Island.

Report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1978, pursuant to section 8 of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act, Chapter I-11, R.S.C., 1970.

ADJOURNMENT

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, March 13, 1979, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Senator Grosart: Would the deputy leader indicate the legislative program that might be before the Senate this week? I am speaking only of the legislative program and not what may be required of the non-legislative committees.

● (2000)

Senator Langlois: We will deal with the legislative items on the order paper, including Bill C-35, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, which was just introduced in the Senate this evening. We also expect two more bills to reach us from the other place tomorrow. One is Bill C-42, dealing with energy supplies, and the second is Bill C-29, dealing with housing.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Tuesday, March 13, 1979, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I take it that this means that this committee is seeking permission to sit tomorrow evening. The Senate is not sitting tomorrow afternoon, and I think the general intention was to allow the whole of Tuesday for committees to sit so that insofar as possible it would not be necessary for any committee to sit when the Senate is sitting in the evening. Perhaps the deputy leader would care to explain why it seems to be necessary for this committee to sit tomorrow evening.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, this motion is made at the request of the Chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Subcommittee on Off-Track Betting, Senator Buckwold. I understand that witnesses have been called for tomorrow night. As you will no doubt recall I announced the sitting of this committee last Thursday on my adjournment motion, and I have been informed that witnesses had been called. I would point out that this will be the only committee sitting tomorrow night. Since we will have three committees sitting in the afternoon, I do not think we could accommodate more than that without putting undue pressure on honourable senators, especially those on the opposition side.

Senator Riley: I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if he is not aware that the Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is sitting tomorrow night. This is a committee for which we do not require the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Senator Langlois: But that is a joint committee of both houses.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES

SEAL HUNT PROTESTERS—QUESTION

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question to put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with the seal hunt. In view of the fact that a violent clash took place in the Gulf of St. Lawrence when the idiot Cleveland Amory was able to spray dye on a good number of seals, which is contrary to fisheries regulations and is in violation of the Fisheries Act, and in view of the fact that he and others concerned have been arrested, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could assure this chamber that Cleveland Amory, and all those who contravene the Fisheries Act, will not be let off as those other idiots Moore and Davis were let off on those past incidents. Would he get that assurance from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, whom I commend for the action he has taken in the past?

● (2010)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the matter is before the appropriate judicial authorities. I understand that a request for bail has been made, but no action has yet been taken. I will seek further information on the matter.

Senator Marshall: I have a supplementary question. In 1976 I made a request to the minister that the dye being used on young seals be analysed to see if it might be harmful. The minister replied to my request in a letter dated March 11, 1976, in which he confirmed my suspicion that "there is some possibility that spraying of the young animals could cause rejection by the adults; thus, the young seal could be abandoned."

In view of that possibility, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could assure the house that the minister will make known to the public of Canada the hypocritical action of Cleveland Amory in supposedly protecting the young seals when in fact he is spraying them with this red dye which causes rejection by the mother seal. Could that be taken into consideration, and if there is a confirmation that there is a rejection, could the public be assured that that man, Cleveland Amory, who is a huckster collecting money from innocent souls on a pretext, will be dealt with as severely as he should be?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that certain scientific authorities have expressed the view that maternal rejection, the rejection referred to by Senator Marshall, may indeed occur. However, because of the technical nature of the inquiry and because I do not have available to me detailed and up-to-date information on the situation, I think it more appropriate to attempt to bring a detailed explanation to this chamber tomorrow.

Senator Marshall: Thank you.

OFF-TRACK BETTING

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE—QUESTION

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government about a statement reported in this morning's Montreal Gazette as having been made by the Minister of Agriculture over the weekend? He is reported as having said in Toronto that off-track betting on horse races should not be legalized because there is already too much gambling in Canada. If I remember correctly, he is the one who asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate to recommend that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs look into this matter. Would the leader tell us in what position that puts the members of that committee?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, first of all, I do not have available to me at this time the complete statement attributed to the minister, and it would not be fair to render any kind of judgment on such a statement if, indeed, such a statement was made in the terms expressed by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. However, let me say that the Minister of Agriculture has on a number of occasions stated that he, personally, does not favour off-track betting. It is a measure of the minister that, despite these deeply held personal views, he has asked the Senate to bring its objective resources to bear on the problem. It is praiseworthy that he has sought our advice despite any personal views he might hold.

I know that honourable senators are aware that in the ultimate, after the Senate's views are made known, the government will propose a course of action that Parliament may choose or approve. Any decision will be a consensus decision, as all decisions of that kind are.

As a result of the evidence which the Senate in good time will produce on the subject of off-track betting, it may be that the minister's views will be confirmed, but it may mean equally that a contrary body of evidence may be brought forward which may induce the minister, in good time, to alter his opinions.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN POLICY RESPECTING HOSTILITIES BETWEEN CHINA AND VIETNAM—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Bosa about the China-Vietnam hostilities. Senator Bosa said:

—I should like to preface my question by saying that some Canadians might feel that when something happens far away it may not affect their lives. On the contrary, we have seen what has happened in Iran, and we are now feeling the repercussions as a result of the change of administration in that country.

We are encouraged by reports we have received which indicate that the Chinese have indeed begun to withdraw their forces from Vietnam, although there are also reports of continued fighting in some sectors. I believe that was confirmed on the news this evening.

We very much hope that the withdrawal will be completed quickly and that talks will commence at the political level to settle outstanding differences in southeast Asia in a peaceful manner.

AGRICULTURE

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, a question was asked recently concerning the International Wheat Agreement, as to whether a report can be brought forward as to the proceedings of the endeavour that has recently been terminated to renegotiate the international wheat agreement. The news reports have it that no agreement has been reached.

I wish to confirm that the United Nations Conference, convened to replace the 1971 international wheat agreement, adjourned on February 14 without reaching agreement. This was the third session of the conference, and it was adjourned when it was concluded that differences among wheat exporting and wheat importing countries on levels of prices, reserve stocks and special provisions for developing countries were too broad to overcome at this time.

[Senator Perrault.]

The conference recommended that the 1971 wheat trade and food aid conventions should be extended. A report on the status of the work of the conference will be prepared with a view to the resumption of negotiations once the International Wheat Council is satisfied that a basis exists to do so.

Canada supported the negotiation of an international wheat agreement as a means of improving stability in world trade to the benefit of both producing and consuming nations. The Canadian objective was to achieve a price range that would return costs of production to Canadian farmers, spread the burden of stock carrying beyond North America, and provide grain reserves as security against shortage situations.

Canada was seeking agreement to a reserve stock of sufficient size to moderate the market within acceptable price levels and to ensure that some wheat is available and held by all major countries to avoid extreme shortages.

Our primary concern was to achieve a good commercial wheat agreement that would benefit Canadian producers and prove effective over the lifetime of the arrangement.

Most major trading countries including Canada recognized that the differences over the basic elements were too broad to overcome at this time. All major countries agreed that a framework for continued co-operation was essential and that the present wheat trade and food aid conventions should be maintained through the extension of the 1971 international wheat agreement.

The Canadian delegation, with the support of a number of farm leaders who served as advisers, worked hard for a positive result and endorsed the conference decision to resume negotiations when positive results can be achieved.

THE ECONOMY

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON INFLATION—TERMS OF REFERENCE AND REPORTING PROCEDURES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on March 6 Senator Roblin asked a question concerning the National Commission on Inflation. The first part of the question was why was the CSIP abolished?

The CSIP was abolished because the government believes that it is necessary for the agency responsible for monitoring prices and incomes to have powers under the Inquiries Act to require the submission of information if it is to be able to do its job properly. The CSIP had requested the voluntary submission of information from 190 of the largest companies, and some of the companies had expressed their reluctance to co-operate. The government could not give the CSIP Inquiries Act powers because such powers were judged to be inconsistent with the mandate of CSIP's parent organization, the Economic Council of Canada, which has broad responsibility to advise and recommend on how Canada can achieve the highest standards of economic performance.

Senator Roblin also asked what is to be expected of the National Commission on Inflation.

It is expected that the commission will provide informed analysis of general price and income developments as well as of specific price and income decisions that appear to be out of line. Where large increases can be shown to result from special circumstances, it is important that these circumstances be explained publicly so that such increases will not become pattern setters. It will also be the duty of the commission to draw other cases of large increases to the attention of the government.

● (2020)

The mandate of the commission will be to monitor changes in prices, profits, compensation and costs in particular sectors and in the economy as a whole; to promote public understanding of the inflationary process and its implications for the economy; to identify particular increases in prices, profits or compensation which appear to merit special attention; to consult with the parties concerned, to assess whether the increases are appropriate in the circumstances and, where the commission deems it advisable, to report publicly; and where, in the opinion of the commission, any particular price, profit or compensation decision is likely to be prejudicial to the objective of reducing inflation and maintaining the competitive position of Canadian industries, to report to the government.

Senator Roblin also asked why a change had been made in the reporting procedures between CSIP and the National Commission on Inflation.

The change in reporting procedures is more a question of emphasis than of substance. According to its terms of reference the National Commission on Inflation has been directed to report to the public when it deems it appropriate to do so. If the commission uncovers cases of unwarranted price and wage increases, it will first consult and negotiate with the persons concerned and attempt to persuade them to modify their behaviour. Only if this fails will the commission resort to publicity. At the same time, the commission will be able to make recommendations to the government which the government will seriously consider.

Honourable senators, there are two short documents here, which are supplementary in nature but which are too long to be read at this time. One is a Department of Finance press release in connection with the establishment of the National Commission on Inflation, and the other is a statement by the Committee of the Privy Council. I would be happy to have these documents made part of today's Hansard, if that is of interest to honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: For what they are worth.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[For text of documents, see appendix, page 742.]

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED
On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-28, intituled: "An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act".—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to the Honourable Senator Adams.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Willie Adams moved the second reading of Bill C-28, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is the first opportunity I have had since my appointment to this house two years ago to move second reading of a bill. Although I am a little nervous about speaking in the house for the first time, I am proud to move second reading tonight of Bill C-28.

Although I have not been a member of the Northwest Territories Council for four years, it gives me great pleasure to support this bill to amend the Northwest Territories Act, the purpose of which, as we all know, is to increase the membership of that Council. Right now there are 15 members, and the bill seeks to increase that number to 22.

I am very familiar with the work of the Northwest Territories Council and with the duties of the Commissioner in Council.

I think we all understand what the bill means. The Northwest Territories comprise 3,350,000 square miles of land, with a population of around 40,000. I therefore think we can understand why we need an enlarged Council, to represent the different nationalities, cultures and languages, because they may well reflect the rest of Canada's citizens. I know from my own experience, in travelling among the different communities, it is sometimes difficult to understand how the people of those communities can be represented. Since I have been here in Ottawa, it has not been difficult to understand how we represent the interests of citizens in the rest of Canada, with their different languages, transportation and communication problems, and organize our government for the benefit of both the north and the south.

I think we all understand how our different cultures enrich the rest of Canada. I have been a member of the Council and I understand the functions of the Prime Minister, and since I have been in Ottawa I have a clearer understanding of how the government operates. However, I appreciate that those who live in the north, who developed the north, understand the people there and how to educate them to live there. Those who live in the Territories know how to live off the land. While the government is moving into the northern communities to teach children what they conceive to be the right way to live, those who have hitherto lived off the land may not fully understand the new laws that they now have to live by. However, in the last few years the people there have had a greater understanding of local government and how to run their communities.

● (2025)

I was elected to the Council of Rankin Hamlet and was chairman for four years. The government gave the Council an annual budget of $12,000 for community associations and other activities.

When I left two years ago, the budget for Rankin Hamlet was a little over a half-million dollars. There is a great difference between $12,000 and a half million dollars to run a community of just over a thousand people.

Under the provisions of the bill the local people have more control over the territory. In 1970 we had two elected Inuit members of Council. Now we have six Inuit members in the Legislative Assembly at Yellowknife, and two members from the central and eastern Arctic.

I think we will have nine or ten elected Inuit members after the spring or fall election. From the Mackenzie Delta, or at least the west, we should have another five or six members. Because of the increased representation, the people of the north will better understand the governing of their community.

We speak of our future development in the north in relation to natural gas from the Arctic islands. We really need representation to help the people in the Arctic understand what is going on in Ottawa.

A week ago in Calgary I met with representatives of Petro-Can. They were talking about two 140,000 ton icebreakers to transport liquefied natural gas from the Arctic islands down to eastern Canada and the United States. Equipped with 200,000 horsepower engines, some vessels make about 15 round trips a year through the ice, in both the winter and the summer. There are two icebreakers transporting natural gas from the Arctic to the south.

Honourable senators, I think we should try to understand the people who live and hunt in the north. We hear much talk nowadays about the seal hunt in Newfoundland. Those people sell seal skins. People in the Hudson Bay area also hunt and sell seal skins for money and use the meat as food.

• (2035)

Nowadays people can buy high-powered guns and high-powered skidoos in order to go out hunting caribou. It used to take the people of the north three or four days to hunt a caribou. Nowadays, in a space of two or three hours, you can shoot several caribou. The result is that many more animals are being killed.

People from the south have started settling in the community, and they are allowed certain quotas in respect of hunting. White settlers in the Northwest Territories were, at one time, allowed to kill five caribou a year. Now that quota has been reduced to two or three caribou per year. As I say, this applies only to people from outside who have settled in the Northwest Territories. The quotas do not apply to the Inuit, but we have to be careful because the caribou population is decreasing every year.

We need some support from the Council in persuading the people of the community to hunt fewer caribou and other animals. At one time no one was settling in the community, and we did not need this support from the Council, but now we do need it in order to teach people how to live off the land.

[Senator Adams]

Honourable senators, this is the first time I have spoken in this chamber, and I hope you now have a better understanding of the way of life of the Inuit and of Inuit culture. People living in the north need your support for this bill. In the meantime, the Inuit need more opportunities to increase their understanding of politics.

After the next federal election I think we are going to have two more seats in the house. I hope that soon there will be another senator to support me, because I cannot represent the whole of the Northwest Territories myself. It is difficult to travel from community to community.

• (2040)

There is one place I wish to mention, a small community called Belcher Island. At the time that I was a member of the Council we called it Belchers. It was named after an old Eskimo by the name of Sanikiluaq, who lived on the west side of Hudson Bay. This would have been close to Labrador, and was a difficult place to get to from Rankin Inlet, Churchill or Montreal. This small community had a population of 300 and was governed from Yellowknife. It takes a long time to get to those communities.

I thank honourable senators for giving me an opportunity to speak on this subject this evening. I commend this bill to the Senate.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 6, the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hayden for the second reading of Bill S-14, respecting bankruptcy and insolvency.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I for one have no objection to Bill S-14 being passed at the second reading stage. The sponsor of the bill, Senator Hayden, fully explained its background. It had two predecessors—one in 1975, Bill C-60, and another one in 1978, Bill S-11. I think this will not be the bill that will be passed. I think it is obvious that the committee will have very little time to consider it. In any case, even if the Senate committee has the time to consider it, make a report on it and send it to the House of Commons, it would die on the order paper at the other place like its two predecessors.

The fact still remains that the work done by the Senate on the two preceding bills was very useful. Senator Hayden explained that out of the 130 recommendations, I think, that we made on Bill C-60, 109 had results since they have been incorporated in the bill now before us.

Certain problems remain. Senator Hayden mentioned the preference given to employees' salaries over secured creditors, particularly creditors secured by mortgages. This posed difficulties respecting the financing of a company's operations. So the government had to give it up to consider the possibility of setting up an insurance fund to replace that preference and make sure the employees of a bankrupt corporation get the back pay which may be due to them at the time of the bankruptcy, that is to make sure they get it a lot faster, of course, than if they had only been given preference over creditors secured under the law. This remains a rather complicated problem. In principle, if the idea is excellent there is the question of whether a host of other people should not get the same insurance.

I was always a little reluctant to accept that proposal which stems, of course, from a natural desire to protect the employees of a bankrupt corporation. Should there not a host of similar guarantees in other areas? That would be another government intrusion in all sorts of areas. Finally, there is no way out of it.

In any case, if eventually a fair solution is found which does not set too dangerous a precedent, I would be quite agreeable. For the time being, we are only giving the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce an opportunity to examine this third bankruptcy bill tabled during this Parliament just before it expires. If the committee has the time to do something, well, that is fine. If not, we will be back in a new Parliament with a fourth bill dealing with the Bankruptcy Act. [English]

On motion of Senator Langlois, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 8, the debate on the motion of Senator Everett for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, at the last sitting, Senator Everett presented the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (B), to which were appended certain documents provided by representatives of the Treasury Board. Supplementary estimates (B), incidentally, will be the last supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year.

Senator Everett gave a full explanation of the proceedings of the committee up to that time, and made some comments on the report which is now before the Senate. As is customary at this time, I shall make a few remarks.

● (2050)

We have an understanding here that the Senate will not consider an appropriation bill based on estimates, main or supplementary, until those estimates have been the subject of a report by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. That has been done, and the way is now clear for consideration of the appropriation bill when it comes before us.

Senator Everett said a few complimentary things about me. He is quite correct when he says that I should know something about the procedures with respect to estimates. The reason is that I am probably the only senator who has had the great privilege of serving on the National Finance Committee under three great chairmen, Senator D'Arcy Leonard, Senator John Aird, and now Senator Doug Everett. Having served under those distinguished senators on that committee, I should know something about estimates procedures, and if it shows once in a while it is perhaps not surprising.

These estimates are, of course, supplementary to the main estimates, and will bring total spending intentions of the government to slightly over $50 billion for this fiscal year. We are told, however, that certain lapses and savings of various kinds will keep total government expenditures for the current fiscal year somewhere in the neighbourhood of $48 billion. We also know, looking ahead, that almost certainly total expenditures for the next fiscal year will rise above $50 billion. In fact, it is almost certain that in Canada we are on the verge of having government spending intentions of $1 billion a week for the first time in our history.

One of the largest items in these supplementary estimates is provision for the servicing of the national debt. This, of course, is closely linked to the spending intentions of the government, past, present and future. Senator Everett, on behalf of the committee, paid tribute to the government for its restraint of spending intentions for the current fiscal year and the year ahead. I agree with that. I do not think any reasonable person can dispute the fact that the government has embarked on a policy of restraining its spending intentions—not necessarily its spending, but its spending intentions. In that respect, it has clearly embarked on a policy of restraint and is to be congratulated, even if, again, it is a last minute conversion on the road to Damascus.

There is the clearest evidence from all those who have examined our current problems that one of the major causes of inflation has been federal government spending over the last few years. There is no question but that this has been a cause of inflation.

Senator Bosa: What about provincial and municipal government spending?

Senator Grosart: That is a very interesting question, and one that is invariably asked at this time.

Senator Perrault: With good reason.

Senator Grosart: The fact of the matter is that the federal government's record is the one that is generally labelled by the economists as the major cause of inflation. It is not enough to say that other governments have contributed, because everyone who is even slightly aware of the relations between the two levels of government—the transfer payments to provincial governments and to individuals—will know that the cause of inflation has been excessive federal government spending.

I am not suggesting that the provinces and the municipalities have not themselves been guilty of this. They have. But that in no way excuses the federal government for its record in this area. Of course, it doesn't. As a matter of fact, what the economists are saying is that the federal government set a bad example and the others followed. That is natural in the circumstances. It is not a good argument. It is put forward, but it is not a good argument. One cannot excuse the excesses of the federal government by saying that others have been excessive. One might just as well say we have all been excessive in our spending habits, which I suppose some of us have.

But that is an aside. I started to say I was prepared to compliment the government on the fact that it has shown restraint in the last two or three years, and has put into place some mechanisms that have been effective. The committee recognized this. Some of the mechanisms are the result of recommendations of the National Finance Committee—a fact that not everyone is aware of.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance was the first committee of any legislature in Canada to insist that the annual increase in federal government expenditures or spending intentions be no more than the increase in the GNP. In fact, it was before the National Finance Committee, whose report we are now considering, that the announcement was first made by the government that this was government policy. I commend the government for that.

It was a policy that was late in being adopted—too late not to leave us with some of the problems which we are now facing due to excessive spending in earlier years. But because the government was at fault then does not mean that, speaking as a member of the National Finance Committee, I am not prepared now to compliment it on some of the mechanisms which have been put in place. One such mechanism, and a very important one—again coming from a recommendation of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance—is that the government will incorporate in its statement of spending intentions for any year the shortfalls, the savings, that can be made and should be made in departmental budgets.

Total government expenditures for this fiscal year—budgetary, non-budgetary, statutory, and so on—amount to $50 billion. However, we are going to spend only $48 billion because of shortfalls in departmental budget authorizations by Parliament. In previous years, the tendency of departments was to make use of the total budgets authorized by Parliament. Everyone knows that in the month or so prior to the end of the fiscal year departments were often looking for ways to spend the moneys allocated. They did not want to let any amount lapse because of the fear the Treasury Board would cut their budget for the next fiscal year. The evidence before the committee was that the departments are actually trying to achieve shortfalls, and in fact are proud of the fact when shortfalls are achieved—and all because this mechanism was introduced. I compliment the government on that.

That was a bit of a digression—perhaps in response to Senator Bosa's interesting question.

As I was saying earlier, one of the major items, or the major item, in the supplementary estimates relates to the servicing of the national debt. Of the total increase in spending intentions of $346 million indicated by these supplementary estimates, $125 million, or more than one-third, relates to the servicing of the public debt. This has to be a cause of concern on the part of anyone who is interested in Canadian fiscal policy. Our public debt is getting too high. There is no question about that. It is very close to being $1 billion. Here in these supplementary estimates, the last supplementary estimates for this fiscal year, we are asked to provide an additional $125 million. This is extra money—money that was not even thought of or anticipated. The exchange problem has something to do with it, but suddenly we are asked to find another $125 million to help service the national debt. That is a problem.

There are those who say that the national debt, when compared to the GNP, is not that bad. Well, honourable senators, we know it is bad, and there are only two ways of getting the public debt under control—one is to stop spending money and the other is to find enough money to meet current expenditures. The government is trying, but in my view, from where I sit, it is not trying hard enough. It can do more, and perhaps it will.

• (2100)

The categories of $1 items in the supplementary estimates concerned the committee. Again it was the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that first drew attention to the serious problem of the use of $1 votes in estimates to achieve results that could and should be achieved by more direct means. One dollar votes are a device, a devious device. In some cases, they can be defended, but the view of our committee generally has been that they should be eliminated as soon as possible. The chairman of the committee in his report commended the government and Treasury Board on the fact that they have minimized the use of $1 votes to amend legislation. This is true, but again I think it is because of the continual raising of the issue by the Senate's National Finance Committee.

In these supplementary estimates we are down to two $1 votes that amend legislation. But here again—and Senator Everett referred to this—what happens is that a statute is amended and generally speaking there is not the slightest mention of it in the statutes. Nobody knows about it. We have had cases before the committee where essential benefits that Canadians were entitled to were not known anywhere because they were hidden away in a $1 vote that usually amended an appropriation act.

The officials, of course, will defend the two cases I mention by saying, "Well, if we were to amend these acts in the usual way, it would mean introducing bills in Parliament which would state specifically that such and such an act is to be amended. But then this parliamentary process is so slow..." Of course it is slow, honourable senators, but the same process applies to any new statute and to any amendment to a statute. What we have said in committee and what we continue to say is that amendment of legislation by a $1 vote is a device that should be dispensed with. The Treasury Board has this under consideration, on the suggestion of our committee. It is quite possible, perhaps twice a year, to introduce a bill in the House of Commons and say, "Here are amendments, some of them important and some of them not so important, to statutes that we would normally propose by $1 votes in the estimates. We now bring them before Parliament. They are purely housekeeping measures. Will you pass them?" In that way every lawyer in Canada, and the public generally, would know that the statutes had been amended.

That is one of our suggestions, and I believe it will not be long before the Treasury Board accepts it. In saying that I pay a compliment to the officials who have been before us over the years. They have been most receptive to suggestions we have made, and over and over again they have implemented them. Many of the improvements in the estimates have been the result of agreement by the officials that the estimates as they are before us are far from perfect. This, of course, is now being reflected very much in the deliberations of the Public Accounts Committee of the other place where these very issues are now being discussed. Again I am delighted to see that the officials are saying, "Yes, we agree, the estimates are not perfect; they don't disclose to members of Parliament or the public the information that members of Parliament and the public are entitled to."

These are some random comments, honourable senators, on the work of this committee which over the years, in my view, has brought a good deal of distinction to the Senate under the chairmen whom I have mentioned and under whom I have had the honour to serve.

Senator Everett raised a few other matters that are indicative of the necessity for continual scrutiny of the estimates, and an attitude of responsiveness on the part of the officials and the ministers to change. He spoke of the question of grants and contributions. There is no total list anywhere of the grants that are made by departments through the estimates and the appropriation bills. Senator Robichaud raised this question, very properly, and I think he was disappointed that he was not able to get more precise answers. But he was able to put on the record a request, and again I think there was a good response from the officials that they would try to come up with a list so that parliamentarians and the public would know what grants are being made, because grants are not subject to audit. Here are large total sums of money that are being given to institutions and organizations around the world—some of them in Canada—which are not subject to audit.

We had a case in the current fiscal year where a very large sum had not been spent by a grantee and it was in the position of being able to put $250,000 in its pocket because it was not required to account for it. When you look at the situation you find immediately, because of the ad hoc way in which the estimates have grown up, that what are called "grants" officially are actually "contributions" and what are called "contributions", in any sense of the English language at least, are "grants". This is the kind of thing we are faced with. And so we have the silly rule that grants are not subject to audit, but contributions are.

These are the kinds of things which your committee is looking at, and I am sure honourable senators will be glad to know that we are getting the kind of response we seek from the officials and through them, very often directly, from the ministers.

There is one final matter I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators and that is the wording "Objects of Expenditure." This is a technical term under which all of the objects of federal government expenditure are broken down and disaggregated by a number of groups. I think they total 11. One is called "Professional and Special Services." This has grown, like Topsy, so that the total this year will amount to something like $1.5 billion, but it is not broken down. Here again it is this ad hoc situation of taking a title and throwing anything you like under there because there is no place else to put it. "Professional and Special Services"—there arises immediately, of course, a suspicion that this is one way to hide the fact that the government is hiring extra people, consultants. This is not true. The components of this particular category title are many. We have suggested that this be broken down because people do assume that the government is just hiring a lot of consultants. Some of us think that the federal government is hiring far too many consultants and specialists in many areas, and you can find them if you go through the public accounts. It is possible to separate them out, but again it is our suggestion that this be broken down. The same thing applies to information where there is no breakdown in the "Objects of Expenditure" as between paid advertising and publicity of various kinds.

Honourable senators, these are the kinds of things that your committee, under its excellent chairman, is trying to accomplish for you. I shall have some brief comments to make on the totality of the expenditures when the appropriation bill is before us, and in the meantime I leave it at that.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, may I ask my honourable friend a question? He spoke about the national debt of this country being far too large and about the fact that it was growing extensively and rapidly, and I had the impression that he said it had now reached $1 billion. If I am wrong in that impression, I should like him to correct it, because I believe that the national debt of Canada is far larger than $1 billion.

Senator Grosart: I am sorry if I gave an incorrect figure. I will be quite happy to correct that—Senator Bosa: I wonder if I may put a question to the honourable senator. When I asked him my first question relating to government spending, I intimated that the provinces and the municipal governments also engaged in spending. The approximate figures are these: 20 per cent of the gross national product is made up by federal government expenditures, and 20 or 21 per cent of the gross national product is made up by municipal and provincial government spending combined.

Does the honourable senator suggest that this problem is confined to Canada only? Moreover, would he not agree that the oil crisis of 1973 contributed to a great extent to inflation in the whole western world?

Senator Grosart: I thank Senator Bosa for his question but, if I may, I will answer Senator Molson's question first.

Senator Molson, I should have said $100 billion; not $1 billion. I am sorry if I made a slip of the tongue there.

Senator Molson: I only wish you could have been right the first time.

Senator Grosart: I did say that the federal government expenditures would probably reach $1 billion a week next year, but the figure for the public debt is, of course, $100 billion.

In reply to Senator Bosa, of course, there are other contributing factors to inflation. We are not the only country that has inflation, nor are we the only country whose government has spent more money than it should have in the last few years. We are only one of many countries. But this is not the time to go into the question of the state of the economy, as I am sometimes tempted to do, and put some facts on record in reply to Senator Perrault's panegyrics on the wonderful state of the economy.

There are figures you can look at. They are not all good as far as Canada is concerned. We have a higher rate of inflation than the United States; we have a higher rate of inflation than would appear to be necessary in international comparisons. The OECD has commented on that in various ways at various times.

I do agree with Senator Bosa that excessive federal government spending is only one of the causes of inflation, but the consensus among those who are competent to judge these matters is that that has been a major, important and unnecessarily excessive cause in the Canadian context.

Senator Flynn: I would like to put a question to Senator Grosart. He mentioned twice, I think, that these supplementaries are the last supplementaries for the current fiscal year. Where does he get that assurance? And, assuming that Parliament will be dissolved, has he any guarantee that Governor General's warrants will not cover additional supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year?

Senator Grosart: I am quite sure the Leader of the Opposition is joking when he asks me to give an opinion on that matter. I can merely say in answer that that was the statement made to the committee in writing, namely that these are the last supplementary estimates we will have for the current year.

Senator Langlois: And they are the smallest supplementaries in the last eight years.

Senator Grosart: Yes, that statement was also made. These are the smallest supplementary estimates in the last eight years.

As to whether the use of Governor General's warrants could be classified as supplementary estimates is beyond me. I would call them something else, I think.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[Senator Bosa.]

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 6, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Petten calling the attention of the Senate to the Canada Winter Games held at Brandon, Manitoba, from February 12 to 24, 1979.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wholeheartedly support the promotion of amateur sport in this country. I wish to extend my thanks and appreciation for the excellent job done by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport in encouraging the youth of our country to participate in sport development. I believe the Canada Winter Games, the Canada Summer Games and sporting activities within the provinces and territories do develop good character among our youth and good physical fitness. They help to train leaders for our society tomorrow and they promote national unity in our country.

In 1973, from August 3 to 12, I had the honour to represent the Province of Prince Edward Island at the Canada Summer Games at New Westminster and Burnaby in British Columbia. I was present for the official opening and for the first week of those games. I left that gathering at New Westminster and Burnaby with a keen commitment to be forever a supporter of amateur sport in this country. Accordingly, I want to congratulate the government for setting up a Ministry of State responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Although I was unable to be present at the Canada Winter Games in Brandon, Manitoba, I want to congratulate all the athletes who participated in them. I want especially to congratulate the athletes who came from Prince Edward Island and the Atlantic provinces, and the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, because those provinces and territories have relatively small populations and lack proper facilities for training athletes. Therefore, I feel that the athletes from those provinces and territories deserve a little extra congratulation for the tremendous performances they gave.

I should like at this time to praise the achievement of a 19-year old speed skater from Montague, Prince Edward Island, Miss Nancy White. Nancy is the first athlete from Prince Edward Island to win a Canada Winter Games gold medal.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

● (2120)

Senator Bonnell: She not only brought home a gold medal, but she also brought back four silver medals. She has already won a total of 14 medals in national and international speed skating competition this year.

When she had completed her participation at the Canada Winter Games in Brandon, she went on to the Canadian national speed skating competition in Regina and won four more bronze medals. The following week she participated in the North American outdoor speed skating championships in Winnipeg and won five more medals.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: She has been named Prince Edward Island's senior female athlete of the year. To date she has been the recipient of three major sports awards in her native province. I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate Nancy for her wonderful effort and victory at the Canada Winter Games. She has brought honour not only to herself, her family and her home town of Montague, but to all Prince Edward Islanders, and I say: Nancy, we are proud of you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: Miss White's accomplishments are remarkable because Prince Edward Island has no outdoor speed skating oval. Training facilities for major competition are limited. Our thanks are due to a gentleman by the name of Pete Milburn, a retired bank manager who is keenly interested in sports. He volunteered his time and services to coaching athletes in speed skating, figure skating, softball and baseball at the local school. As a result of that coaching over the past couple of years, Nancy was able to bring home a gold medal from Brandon.

Two other young people from the same school, George Cameron and Kevin O'Brien, who also benefited from that coaching, made an excellent showing in the Games.

In addition to those who bring home medals there are those who volunteer their time and energy in coaching youngsters and who also deserve recognition. Therefore, at this time I would like to express Prince Edward Island's thanks to people like Pete Milburn from Murray River.

The promotion of amateur sport not only encourages the building of good physical and mental health, but it also provides training in leadership, good sportsmanship, and citizenship. Many of the young people who participate in these games will make wonderful leaders in our society of tomorrow.

But, honourable senators, I was rather disappointed to hear the Leader of the Government state in the Senate on Thursday last, that the CBC was not prepared to cover the opening ceremonies of the Canada Winter Games without financial support from Loto Canada.

I believe our national network should make every effort to cover national sports events, such as the Canada Winter Games and the Canada Summer Games in which all provinces and territories participate. Nothing promotes national unity more than our young people meeting together in competition and learning from each other about this great country of ours. I believe it is the duty of our national network to promote national unity, and to allow all Canadians to see their young athletes in action as they participate in these great sporting events.

I am of the opinion that the Canada Winter Games and the Canada Summer Games not only encourage our young people to participate in sport, but they also provide an opportunity for towns like Burnaby, British Columbia, St. John's, Newfoundland, and Brandon, Manitoba, to provide the necessary facilities, which remain as landmarks and enable young people in the area to train for further competition in the years ahead.

In closing, I would like to say that I believe the Senate should, in future, send an official representative to our Summer and Winter Games to report back, as was done unofficially on this occasion by Senator Petten. We would then have an opportunity to recognize and discuss those young Canadians who participate successfully in amateur sport.

On motion of Senator McElman, for Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 8 p.m.

Department of Finance Press Release:

Ottawa, March 2, 1979

Finance Minister Jean Chrétien announced today that the government is establishing new arrangements for the monitoring of prices, profits, compensation and costs. A new organization, the National Commission on Inflation, will be established by Order in Council under the Inquiries Act.

High increases in food prices, high increases in prices of certain other goods, and some rather high recent wage settlements, together with the effects of the depreciation of the dollar, are aggravating the problem of achieving lower rates of inflation.

If our economic potential is to be realized, it is essential that Canadians making price and income decisions exercise a great deal of responsibility. This requires a high public awareness of the economic environment in which price and income developments are taking place. Monitoring will provide informed analysis of general price and income developments as well as of specific price and income decisions that appear to be out of line. Where large increases can be shown to result from special circumstances, it is important that these circumstances be explained publicly so that such increases will not become pattern-setters. It will also be the duty of the Commission to draw other cases of large increases to the attention of the government.

The mandate of the Commission will be:

- to monitor changes in prices, profits, compensation and costs in particular sectors and in the economy as a whole,
- to promote public understanding of the inflationary process and its implications for the economy,
- to identify particular increases in prices, profits or compensation which appear to merit special attention, to consult with the parties concerned, to assess whether the increases are appropriate in the circumstances and, where the Commission deems it advisable, to report publicly,
- where, in the opinion of the Commission, any particular price, profit or compensation decision is likely to be prejudicial to the objective of reducing inflation and maintaining the competitive position of Canadian industries, to report to the government.

The National Commission on Inflation will have powers under the Inquiries Act to require the submission of information, although it is expected that it will be able to obtain virtually all of the information it requires on a voluntary basis.

The Commission will not have power to defer or roll back price or income increases.

The Commission will replace the Centre for the Study of Inflation and Productivity (CSIP). Mr. Chrétien expressed the government's appreciation to the Economic Council of Canada and to CSIP for taking on the government's request a year ago to monitor prices and incomes and for making a significant contribution with a relatively small staff and limited access to information. The government believes that the new approach, involving Inquiries Act powers, is incompatible with the mandate of the Economic Council.

Mr. Chrétien has discussed this change in monitoring arrangements with his provincial colleagues. The Commission will consult with the provincial governments at an early stage. It will not inquire formally into price or income decisions by the provincial governments and their agencies without the consent of the provincial government concerned.

There is no restriction of the powers of the Commission to examine and report on the price and income decisions of the Government of Canada and its agencies.

The term of the Commission will expire on June 30, 1980.

The Order in Council establishing the Commission will appoint Mr. Harold A. Renouf as Chairman. Mr. Renouf is the Chairman of the Anti-Inflation Board. Other Commissioners will be named shortly.

It is expected that a number of staff of the new Commission will come from CSIP, some from the AIB and some from other government and private sector sources. The total staff will be under 100.

Mr. Chrétien emphasized that the AIB will continue with its schedule of completing the processing of returns and cases applicable to the pre-December 31, 1978, controls period. It is expected that this process will be completed soon. Mr. Renouf will continue to serve as AIB chairman during this period.

Statement by The Committee of the Privy Council:

The Committee of the Privy Council had before it a report of the Minister of Finance submitting:

That reductions in the rate of inflation are essential to maintain and improve the welfare of Canadians and the effective functioning of the economy;

That the maintenance of the competitive position of Canadian industries is an essential precondition for increasing the production of goods and services for sale in Canada and abroad and providing employment for Canadians;

That increasing public attention is being focussed on increases in prices and incomes that could be prejudicial to reductions in the rate of inflation;

That Canadians making price and income decisions must exercise a high degree of responsibility, in order to ensure that such decisions do not compromise the ability of the economy to achieve its potential;

And that responsible behaviour requires that Canadians be aware of the economic environment in which price and income decisions are taking place and of the circumstances surrounding such decisions that appear to be extraordinary, so that they may make informed judgments as to whether such decisions are justified in the circumstances, bearing in mind the possible consequences for economic performance.

The Committee, therefore, on the recommendation of the said Minister, advise that Mr. Harold A. Renouf of the City of Ottawa, Province of Ontario, be appointed a Commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act to inquire into prices, profits, compensation and costs in Canada and:

1. to monitor changes in prices, profits, compensation and costs in particular sectors and industries within the economy and for the Canadian economy as a whole, and to publish periodic reports commenting on the reasons for such changes and their implications for the objectives of achieving declining rates of inflation and strengthening the competitive position of Canadian industries;
2. through publication of reports, public hearings and meetings and such other methods as the Commissioner considers appropriate, to promote public understanding of the inflationary process and its implications for the economy;
3. where, in the opinion of the Commissioner, particular increases in prices, profits or compensation appear to merit special attention, to consult with the parties concerned and, following such consultation, to assess the circumstances surrounding such increases in prices, profits or compensation with a view to determining whether such increases are appropriate in the circumstances, and, where the Commissioner deems it advisable, to report publicly with due dispatch;

4. where, in the opinion of the Commissioner, any particular price, profit or compensation decision is or is likely to be prejudicial to the objectives referred to in paragraph (1) hereof, to so report to the Governor in Council.

The Committee further advise:

1. that the Commissioner be designated as the National Commission on Inflation;
2. that the Commission be authorized to adopt such procedures and methods as it may from time to time deem expedient for the proper conduct of its duties;
3. that the Commission be authorized to exercise all powers conferred on Commissioners by section 11 of the Inquiries Act;
4. that the Commission be authorized to engage the services of such counsel, staff, clerks and technical advisers as it may require at rates of remuneration and reimbursement to be approved by the Treasury Board;
5. that the Commission be authorized to publish its reports and the results of its studies and investigations under its own authority;
6. that the officers and employees of the departments of the Government of Canada render such assistance to the Commission as may be required for its activities;
7. that the Commissioner be appointed for a term expiring on June 30, 1980.
8. that the said Mr. Harold A. Renouf will be designated as Chairman of the said Commission.

[For text of report see appendix.]

Senator Hayden: With leave, I should like to add a few words in explanation of the report.

Senator Flynn: You are going to say more than a few words if you are going to read it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hayden: Senator Flynn has corrected me. I should withdraw the phrase "a few words" because it may take more than a few words, but I will be as sparing with the words as I can and still give sense to what I say.

I appreciate, of course, that a study of subject matter is simply a pre-study of the bill. When the pre-study is presented in the form of a report, such as it has been tonight in connection with the tax bill, the practice heretofore has been that the subject of the report is not debated at this stage because we do not have the bill before the Senate. The report is simply a preparation for a more complete understanding of the bill as and when it comes before us.

On that basis, I want to add some explanatory remarks and highlight some of the subjects dealt with in the bill. The first is quite obvious. Clause 1 of the bill deals with the employment expense deduction. Heretofore the taxpayer was allowed to deduct from his income an amount which was the lesser of $250 or 3 per cent of the income from his office and employment. This amount of $250 has been increased to $500, and the information we had before the committee was that approximately 6,200,000 taxpayers will receive some benefit as a result of this.

So much for what you might call the "goodies." The next item I come to is a minimum maturity age of 60 in connection with registered retirement savings plans. You will note in running through a number of the subjects that I propose to discuss that they deal in some aspect or other with RRSPs or life annuities or life insurance.

In the bill passed last year the idea was introduced of having a minimum age of 60 applicable to registered retirement savings plans. Below that age such a plan could not mature. Last year, in our report to this house, we said that in our opinion this provision would create unnecessary and severe problems for persons who require payment prior to age 60. At page 56 of Bill C-37, subclause 46(5) provides certain exceptions under which an annuitant may mature his plan before age 60. Those provisions are as follows:

(B) the annuitant or his spouse receives a disability pension under the Canada Pension Plan or a provincial pension plan as defined in section 3 of that Act, or

(C) where the spouse of the annuitant has died, the annuitant receives a survivor's pension under [either plan].

In the course of our study of this bill in committee, and in our examination of the provisions of entitlement to disability pension contained in the Canada Pension Plan, we felt, having regard to the decisions which have been made by the Canada Pension Plan Appeal Board and also the provisions in the act, and the definition, that this was too severe a test to apply to the question of entitlement to a disability pension. For that reason, we studied it from the point of view of determining what other way there might be of dealing with this.

● (2010)

Senator Flynn, during the course of the committee hearings, suggested that possibly the way to deal with it would be to provide generally that any entitlement to disability pension—any ailment or physical condition which would qualify an individual for entitlement to pension—be the criterion.

We found in an information circular issued by Revenue Canada in February of this year a provision that would meet that situation. Under that provision, instead of requiring that the income tax division apply tests to determine whether or not a person wishing to mature an RRSP earlier than age 60 could do so, the criterion would be one's entitlement to a disability pension. In other words, if the condition of disability were of such severity and permanence that the individual was unable to resume his or her occupation, and it was so certified by a medical practitioner, that would be sufficient qualification to entitle the annuitant to mature his or her RRSP earlier than at age 60.

Honourable senators have to remember that the annuitant is dealing with his own money. He has put his money into this RRSP, and in the last year the government has introduced a bill with a provision that he cannot take it out until he reaches age 60. The explanation for this is that the RRSP is part of a retirement plan, and the ability to mature such RRSPs earlier than at age 60 may well have the effect of eroding the effectiveness of the plan.

It was the view of the committee that disentitlement to early maturity would create a hardship on those who became disabled. For that reason, we make this recommendation. If our recommendation is ultimately written into the law, an individual seeking to mature his RRSP before age 60 would have to qualify for entitlement under the Canada Pension Plan or a provincial pension plan. In those cases where the qualifying provisions are too severe, our recommendation would give him a fair and better chance of getting at the money he has accumulated in an RRSP.

It must be remembered that depending on the circumstances under which he may take it out, under which he may mature it, if he takes out the money he is subject to income tax on the amount he takes out; or he may, of course, at that time acquire an income averaging annuity. In that way he delays the heavy weight of taxation on all the money in the fund, and the payments, as he receives them, are the payments that would be subject to income tax.

The next subject matter also concerns RRSPs, under the heading of Commutation of Benefits at Death. In our report last year—honourable senators will find this in the report which I have just tabled—we recommended the following in connection with the commutation of benefits at death:

The Income Tax Act was amended, effective June 30, 1978, to the effect that except where the spouse is the beneficiary, benefits pursuant to an RRSP are commutable at death and the annuitant is deemed to have received the value thereof immediately before death. As a result, the deceased is taxed in the year of death on the fair market value of his RRSP.

We thought that that provision would work hardship, and so we recommended against it in our report last year. We said:

Furthermore, the proposal may create hardship for the deceased's estate. The beneficiaries receive the proceeds whereas the estate is obliged to pay the tax—and usually at a higher rate than that which would be applicable to the beneficiaries.

It is recommended that in the event the deceased dies without a spouse and the children of the deceased are the beneficiaries of his RRSP, there be no commutation of the RRSP benefits at his death and he not be taxed in the year of death; rather, the children be taxed on the benefits received with the option of deferring tax through the purchase of an income averaging annuity contract.

That was the state of the law in 1978, and those were the recommendations made by your committee, which were critical of the proposals which were passed into law at that time.

Subclause 46(3) of the bill proposes amendments to provide relief in situations where both parents die leaving minor or disabled children. If there is no surviving spouse, the portion of a plan passing to a child or dependent grandchild equal to $5,000 multiplied by the number of years until the child reaches 26 years of age will be included in the child's income—that is, when it is received. Of course, at that time the child may defer paying tax on such amount by purchasing an income averaging annuity contract, and in those circumstances there is no question of tax falling upon the deceased annuitant's estate.

● (2020)

Dependants, of course, are defined in the act as being children and grandchildren. For those who are dependants by reason of physical or mental infirmity, the full amount of the balance of the plan will be included in their income rather than being in the income of the deceased. Again the dependants would have the same option to take an income averaging annuity contract and so defer payment of tax, which would be limited to the instalment of payments which would be received in each year under the plan.

We have certain comments to make on these proposals. We think the consideration of the law in connection with RRSPs is becoming more important in the minds of government, and the position of those who avail themselves of this and attempt to provide in this way for their own later years is being recognized. However, there are still some further things that should be done to expand the methods in connection with the maturity of plans at age 60, the maturity of plans in any event at age 71, and the options that are open at age 71 and would carry through to age 90. All these things are being looked at. In committee there was considerable discussion of this, and we think there is field for more effort.

In that connection, I should tell you that we had before us the Trust Association of Canada, whose evidence was very enlightening. They took an intelligent approach, particularly to the area starting at age 71, the options that are open and the advantages and disadvantages. While the bill itself does not deal particularly with those points, their view is now a matter of record, and we have perpetuated it by putting it in our report so that it will come to the attention of the government. We feel that, while there has been some favourable development in the way in which the rights of annuitants under RRSPs have been recognized, there is still much more to be done.

The next subject I want to touch on for a moment is that of life annuities. This subject is dealt with in our report at pages 19 to 21, and has to do with clause 50 of the bill. It is proposed that after 1979 interest income accumulated and realized on any lump sum or other payment under a life annuity contract be included in the taxpayer's income. Our chief complaint about this provision was that it had a retroactive feature. In other words, with this change in the law, these lump sum payments at maturity became fully taxable, whereas under the existing law they are not.

It is the view of your committee that a person be entitled to proceed under the law as it existed at the time the budget was announced. This enabled a person to secure a life annuity with payments suitable to him and with maturity dates upon which he decided, as long as it could not be found that he schemed in some way to abuse the provisions of the Income Tax Act. I will deal with that in a moment. It is the basis of our recommendation that the retroactivity should not exist.

The departmental representatives who appeared before the committee told us of some abuses—abuses because of the way in which the law was framed. One example of abuse was that certain persons contracted for annuities with maturity at age 105. Of course, to get the result of that under the then existing law, they would have to establish that no moneys were taken out in that period. If that were the case, the income would be taxable. However, it must be realized that not all annuitants could achieve the age of 105. Therefore, under the existing law, if the plan matured by reason of death before the age of 105, and no moneys were taken out, the lump sum payment which would develop as a result of that maturity would not be taxable.

Obviously, there is something wrong in allowing that sort of benefit to taxpayers. In the view of the committee, it was like swatting a fly with an elephant, when all that had to be done was really to establish by law what would be the standard or normal life expectancy.

[Senator Hayden.]

The committee heard testimony from various doctors and insurance people indicating that the normal life expectancy is age 82, 83 or 84. The departmental officials said that those who availed themselves of this age 105 provision could not look forward to such a life expectancy simply on the basis of having contracted for a life annuity to age 105. Of course, in the meantime, the only thing that would be taxed on the way through from the writing of the contract to its maturity would be the interest element in those payments that would be made if it were the kind of contract providing for instalment payments. There would be mixed interest and capital, and the interest element would, of course, be subject to income tax.

● (2030)

The next item I would like to speak about for a moment is an amendment that was introduced last year to the Income Tax Act dealing with the adjusted cost basis of life insurance policies, and the situation that developed. The view of the department, as stated before us on many occasions, has been that the interest paid on policy loans is not true interest, and therefore there was a proposal at one stage to disallow that interest as a deduction because, as they said, all the policyholder was getting was an advance payment on his equity in the policy. They said that there was an interest in the policy, namely, the cash surrender value, and that this was an advance payment. What do you do, however, if the policyholder physically pays interest on his policy loan, and where do you account for that? The way the law was stated was that the policyholder is not entitled to deduct the interest, and that he is not entitled to deduct the interest that went back further than 1978. The explanation given by the departmental officers before your committee for that provision was that the insurance companies would not have records of the interest payments prior to 1978.

The view of your committee—and this was our recommendation last year as well as again this year—is that if the taxpayer can establish to the satisfaction of a court, or in any other circumstances, that he has made these payments, he should be entitled to add them to the adjusted cost basis of his policy. This is denied in the bill before us; that is to say—if I may use my own language to paraphrase the bill—that no matter what you do, and no matter what evidence you adduce, you are not entitled to add to your adjusted cost basis interest earned prior to 1978.

Our position last year, and again this year, has been that, as a general principle, if the taxpayer can establish bona fide—and he may even have his cancelled cheques, whether the insurance company records are produced or not—showing that he paid this money, then he should be entitled to add it to his adjusted cost basis when the time comes to determine what gain he has made on the proceeds of the policy, and that he may receive at some future date. This is another of our recommendations.

There are a number of other items that might be regarded as highlights in the bill, but I do not want to go into a detailed analysis of the bill, and I think that with perhaps one other reference I will call it a night.

The reference I have in mind is to a heading that I will give you as Interest on Funds Borrowed to Purchase Annuities. There is a general principle of law, which even the income tax authorities acknowledge, to the effect that interest on money borrowed to earn income is deductible, and in the same way interest on money borrowed to purchase a life annuity should be deductible. The position of the taxpayer heretofore has been that he was entitled to deduct interest on money borrowed to earn income from business or property, thus enabling him to deduct interest on money borrowed to purchase annuities, but subclause 7(3) of the bill, on page 4, provides that for 1978 and subsequent taxation years the taxpayer's only entitlement is to deduct interest paid on money borrowed before 1978 to purchase an annuity before 1978—and that is the only right that this clause would leave him—if the annuity payments commence no later than the date on which the annuitant becomes 75. The right must therefore be in relation to a life annuity contract which matures no later than age 75.

The difference between the bill and the attitude of your committee is as follows: The bill says that for 1978 and subsequent taxation years a taxpayer is only entitled to deduct interest on money borrowed before 1978 in order to purchase an annuity before 1978, so they have blocked out that period. The transactions, the payment of interest and the acquisition of a life annuity must all happen before 1978, but interest on money borrowed after that time is not susceptible to the same treatment of deductibility.

What the witnesses who appeared before us had to say was that the interest should be deductible at all times. It is difficult to follow the logic as a result of which you block a period before 1978, saying that in that period the right to deduct interest on borrowed money, if the money is borrowed to earn income, will be recognized, and the answer to that is that on and after 1978 that principle no longer applies.

• (2040)

The explanation of the department was simply this: They said, "if we permit deductibility of this interest throughout where a person borrows money in order to contract for a life annuity, and the maturity date is, say, 75, there are many years of tax deferral, and that is too long a time." I suppose the answer, if I may paraphrase it, is that on that basis the government will have to wait too long for their money. They would appear to be prepared to abandon that rule of general application, that interest on borrowed money is deductible, where that borrowed money is used to earn income. They abandon that principle, which I thought was enshrined in the taxation laws, and they impose this limit in order to compel an earlier payment of tax on the interest, or the equivalent of payment of tax with respect to the non-deductibility of the interest.

Honourable senators, there are other items in the report, but I am not going to weary you with them tonight. However, I should like to emphasize again the very valuable contribution which the Trust Companies Association of Canada made. Page 44 of the report states:

The recommendations of the Trust Companies Association of Canada do not relate to Bill C-37. However, your committee considers their recommendations to have merit and feels they should be given consideration by the Minister.

I may tell you that they were very pertinent recommendations that dealt particularly with the area of options that they thought should exist for the benefit of the annuitant as and when his RRSP matured at age 71 and he has to find his way through an income-averaging annuity from 71 to 90. The scale of payments for that period of time, of course, will depend, to some extent, on the interest earned over that period of time. Furthermore, the scale of annual payments to the annuitant ranges on an elevating scale depending, of course, on the accumulation of income of interest in the supporting fund. I am sure, to any government department dealing with this subject matter, this was very useful information because it came from very knowledgeable people—people who are dealing with this situation almost daily.

Having said that, and having taken perhaps longer than I felt I was entitled to, and certainly having greatly exceeded my original statement—which I am glad I amended—that I was going to say "a few words," this is as far as I am going to take it tonight.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Forsey, I have the honour to table the Sixth Report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, as follows:

Tuesday, March 13, 1979

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

Sixth Report as follows:
(Statutory Instruments No. 7)

1. In relation to its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, 1970-72, c. 38, your Committee has determined to draw the attention of the Houses to

SI/79-20—Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order

SOR/79-159—Domestic First Class Mail Regulations, amendment

SOR/79-161—Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment

The purported effect of these three instruments is to increase the rates of postage for letters of sixteen ounces or less posted in Canada for delivery in Canada and for Canadian newspapers and periodicals transmitted by mail in Canada for delivery in Canada despite the fact that Parliament has set the rates of postage for such items in explicit terms in sections 10 and 11 of the Post Office Act.

2. These three instruments purport to have the same legal effect as that claimed for SI/76-101, Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order; SOR/76-552, Domestic First Class Mail Regulations, section 6; SOR/76-553, Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment, Items 1 and 2, Schedule A; SI/78-60, Postmaster General Authority to Prescribe Fees Order; SOR/78-297, Domestic First Class Mail Regulations, amendment; and SOR/78-298, Second Class Mail Regulations, amendment, which having been objected to by your Committee, were drawn to the attention of the Houses in your Committee's Third Report for the 1976-77 Session and its Fourth Report for the 1977-78 Session.

3. Your Committee deplores the persistent defiance of Parliament by the Crown in the setting of postal rates. Your Committee's objection to the way in which the Crown has proceeded in 1976, in 1978 and again in 1979 is based partly on vires, since the Post Office Act is a special Act (and prior to the Post Office Act as regards the letter rate), relating to services and facilities which your Committee is sure Parliament never thought would include the Canadian postal system. The validity of the Crown's actions under section 13 of the Financial Administration Act has been upheld at first instance in the Federal Court. Your Committee's objection is, however, also based on the unusual and unexpected use by the Crown of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act to intrude into an area Parliament has always hitherto reserved to itself. It was on this basis that your Committee drew the special attention of the Houses to the instruments purporting to effect the 1976 and 1978 rate increases in its Third Report for the 1976-77 Session and its Fourth Report for the 1977-78 Session. That latter Report was concurred in unanimously by both Houses.

Respectfully submitted,

Eugene A. Forsey
Joint Chairman

Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 78(3) I move, for Senator Forsey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. I make this request on behalf of the joint chairman, Senator Forsey, who is involved in an important committee meeting tonight.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I should like to ask whether the reports that have been presented to this chamber this evening are in both official languages.

Senator Hayden: The report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is in both official languages.

[Senator Riley.]

Senator Riley: And the report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is also in both official languages.

Senator Guay: Thank you.

INCOME TAX

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-37

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, we are perhaps proceeding with a little more expedition than is necessary under the circumstances because it was my intention to direct a question to Senator Hayden relating to the report of his committee which he has just tabled.

My question refers to the very interesting statement that draft regulations, under parts of the bill, were made available by the minister prior to the passage of the bill. Would the chairman of the committee care to comment on the extent to which these draft regulations cover the whole purpose of the bill, or do they relate merely to the small business section? If so, is this a policy which, in the opinion of the chairman of the committee, should be encouraged in the presentation of all bills? In other words, when a bill is presented to Parliament, we should, in all cases, have a draft of the regulations. This is a suggestion that has been made from time to time in this chamber.

Senator Hayden: I think the matter of demanding regulations where they are referred to in the bill has almost reached the stage of a matter of policy so far as the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is concerned. One of the departmental officials who appeared before us accounted for the early delivery of the regulations this time by saying they were fully aware of the attitude of the committee and its refusal to go too far in its consideration of a bill if parts of the bill were dependent on regulations that were not produced. I think you can take that as an attitude of the committee. Perhaps it should be enshrined in the law. I don't know how we can incorporate it in our committee procedure, unless we establish some rules and guidelines for the conduct of committees. I would certainly support that.

As far as these regulations are concerned, they deal mainly with small business. I had intended to deal with small business tonight, but I did not do so because I saw how time was running along. It is not that I was not ready to—I am still ready to—but that is the reason I did not deal with it.

Senator Grosart: My understanding is that this is the first time, in relation to this kind of a bill, that the minister has tabled a detailed ways and means motion. Is this again at the urging of the committee?

Senator Hayden: Let me answer you in this way: This is not the first time a minister has produced regulations in connection with our study of a bill. In connection with our study of the subject matter of Bill C-37—

Senator Asselin: Is this a debate? I rise on a point of order, honourable senators. I should like to know if this is the time for a debate of the report that has been tabled by Senator Hayden. I don't know if this is a period for questioning or a period for debate. I should like to know the views of His Honour the Speaker on this.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I quite agree with the Honourable Senator Asselin that these questions, as of now, are out of order. I should have imagined that probably later on Senator Grosart would have asked leave to ask questions.

● (2050)

On the other hand, I think Honourable Senator Asselin is right, and those questions are out of order as of now.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it is far from me to question a ruling of the Chair, especially from such a distinguished incumbent, but my understanding was that leave had been granted to the chairman of the committee to comment on the report and, therefore, a debate had started. Under our rules, it is my understanding that a debate starts when any comment is made, but I may be wrong on that.

It would certainly be, I think, the first time—and again I am not questioning the ruling—that a question arising from the debate originated by the chairman of a committee has been ruled out of order. Surely, if my questions are out of order, the comment by the chairman is out of order because he asked leave to institute a debate. That is as I understand the rules, but I may be wrong.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I do not know if honourable senators understood me, but when Honourable Senator Hayden rose I asked if he had leave to give some explanation. After he had given his explanation there was a motion by the Honourable Senator Riley. After the motion of Honourable Senator Riley was adopted, Honourable Senator Grosart rose. I do not think that was the right time for Honourable Senator Grosart to ask questions on the subject developed by Honourable Senator Hayden.

It is my view, as I said before, that Honourable Senator Grosart can rise later and ask leave to ask questions following the explanation given by Honourable Senator Hayden. That is my reason for intervening. Because a point of order was raised by Senator Asselin, I had to make a decision.

Senator Grosart: Of course, I accept the decision of the Chair.

I should point out that I did say that I would have risen immediately after Senator Hayden had resumed his seat but no opportunity was given by the Chair at that particular time for any honourable senator to rise and ask a question.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I am sorry, but I did not hear the honourable senator. Nevertheless, I think everything will be in order now.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, on the same subject, may I put a question to Senator Hayden for the purpose of clarification? I too intended to ask him a question, but the speediness of Senator Riley prevented me from doing so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: I think the honourable senator should wait until later. There is much business before the house tonight, and I feel that the question should have been asked when Honourable Senator Hayden resumed his seat. I am sorry for Honourable Senator Grosart but, as I told him, if he did ask permission I did not understand him.

That is my ruling. It seems that some honourable senators are not in agreement. Perhaps the honourable senator could ask his question later.

Senator Bosa: I will ask Senator Hayden privately.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a) moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, March 14, 1979, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The request for this motion was made by the chairman of the committee. As honourable senators no doubt know, the chairman of the committee, according to a unanimous decision of the committee on this referendum legislation, has invited the provincial attorneys general to appear before the committee or make written representations to the committee.

A few days ago a letter from the Attorney General of British Columbia was received. He did not ask to appear in person before the committee, but he made representations in writing, and the committee this afternoon decided to invite the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations to make his views on these representations from the Attorney General of British Columbia known to the committee.

The only time available for the minister to appear before the committee is tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock, and this is the reason behind this motion.

Senator Flynn: I am very much in agreement after what happened last week.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a) moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, March 14, 1979, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

I would like to add a word of explanation at this stage. This committee is to sit only at 4 o'clock tomorrow afternoon. At the request of the chairman of the committee, we are asking for permission to sit while the Senate is sitting, but it is not expected that the Senate will be in session at that time tomorrow afternoon. Outside witnesses have been invited to appear before the committee, and this is the reason for adopting this procedure.

If the Senate is still in session, the chairman would not mind if the committee is delayed a few minutes after 4 o'clock in order not to inconvenience honourable senators.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS

REPORT OF SPECIAL INTERDEPARTMENTAL TASK FORCE— QUESTION

Senator Haidasz: I should like to ask the government leader whether the report of the Special Interdepartmental Task Force on Pensions has been received by the cabinet and whether it is the intention of the government to make it public and, if so, when we can expect it done?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I take the question as notice.

FISHERIES

ADVERSE PUBLICITY OF SEAL HUNT—QUESTION

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, in view of the adverse publicity the seal hunt has received in Canada and many other countries, with Canadians portrayed as being insensitive to the environment and showing disregard for the possible extinction of an animal species, are the Governments of Canada and Newfoundland prepared to present the facts so that Canadians may be apprised of what is really happening?

● (2100)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, far be it from me to attempt to speak on behalf of the Government of Newfoundland. However, I understand that there has been developed by the federal government an informational program on the subject of the seal hunt.

I shall take the question as notice and endeavour to obtain current information with respect to the extent of that program. I, along with many other Canadians, feel that some of those who criticize the seal hunt are doing so without being acquainted with the facts. Indeed, some of these critics come from abroad, countries where there has been a decimation of certain species of endangered wildlife—authentic threats which might more usefully command their primary concerns.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

OFF-TRACK BETTING

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE—QUESTION

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government relating to a question asked yesterday by Senator Flynn in connection with a statement by the Minister of Agriculture pertaining to off-track betting. As was admitted by the Leader of the Government, the question was not fully answered.

[Senator Langlois.]

If the statement attributed to the Minister of Agriculture is correct, I would consider it an embarrassment to the Leader of the Government in this chamber, who would appear to have been misled—

Senator Flynn: That is not easy.

Senator Sparrow: —by the Minister of Agriculture. The Leader of the Government, in responding to Senator Flynn's question, said:

—first of all, I do not have available to me at this time the complete statement attributed to the minister, and it would not be fair to render any kind of judgment on such a statement if, indeed, such a statement was made in the terms expressed by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Has the Leader of the Government had an opportunity to review the complete text of the statement attributed to the minister, and can he now take away any of the sting of embarrassment caused by that statement both to this chamber and to himself?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, let me say at the outset that I may have a different perspective, but I feel neither aggrieved nor insulted because the Minister of Agriculture, in his usual outspoken and unique fashion—

Senator Flynn: That is what I said.

Senator Perrault: —has chosen to offer certain comments on the subject of off-track betting. I would be willing to wager—perhaps that is the wrong way to put it; but may I speculate that the Minister of Agriculture, as I said yesterday, spoke as an individual and his comments must be viewed in that light.

He did send a note to me yesterday afternoon stating that he looks forward with great anticipation to the objective study which he knows the Senate will undertake on the subject of off-track betting.

I hardly think it necessary to say that there is a great diversity of private opinion to be found among members of Parliament, including members of cabinet. Like everyone else, the Minister of Agriculture is entitled to his own views on any given subject. I think the significant fact is that he has not attempted to impose his own personal views on the subject of off-track betting. He has not attempted to impose his personal views, through legislation in the Parliament of Canada, on the Canadian people. I do not think he can be criticized for the comments he is alleged to have made.

Senator Grosart: He just got his foot stuck in his mouth.

Senator Sparrow: Honourable senators, I apologize for rising again, but I do not think I have had an answer to my question.

The Leader of the Government, in replying to Senator Flynn yesterday, said he did not have the complete statement of the minister, and I am wondering if he now has that statement. If not, I would ask him to undertake to place it before us tomorrow, or as soon as he can get the complete statement. I think it is very important that this chamber be provided with the complete statement of the minister.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have the text of the minister's remarks. Indeed, it may be that no text was issued. I rather think the comments in question were random comments. The Minister of Agriculture has been known in the past to make random comments on a wide range of subjects, including the Senate. He very frequently makes such statements without the issuance of formal press releases. It may be that no text is available.

The matter is under review, and I will attempt to obtain that statement.

Senator Sparrow: I thank the Leader of the Government. Let me say that I will be very upset if it turns out that this chamber made the decision to refer this whole question of off-track betting to a committee of the Senate simply because the Minister of Agriculture is prone to making random statements and random requests of the Leader of the Government in this chamber.

Senator Langlois: Question!

Senator Sparrow: I have asked my question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think the issue is a bit overblown. Other politicians, including some in the party to which I hold loyalty, make statements from time to time which may not be necessarily in exact accord with party or government policy at a particular time. That happens in the normal course of events in politics. Why, it is known to occur from time to time in the great historical party represented across the way from me.

Senator Flynn: Never!

Senator Sparrow: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but my further question is whether it is normal for members of the cabinet to make such statements. The Leader of the Government, being a member of the cabinet, might be able to answer that question.

Senator Flynn: I think he is of the same kind, an endangered species.

PARLIAMENT

DISTRIBUTION OF LAPEL PINS TO MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—QUESTION

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate in relation to lapel pins that were distributed to members of the House of Commons earlier today by the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Honourable James Jerome. The lapel pins are round and are made of silver. They have a maple leaf background and a gold mace depicted on them.

In view of the fact that honourable senators are also members of Parliament and are, in my opinion, equal to members of the House of Commons, I would ask the Leader of the Government to look into the possibility of identical or similar pins being distributed to members of this place.

Senator Langlois: We are not equal. We are on top.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not know whether these buttons are available to honourable senators, but the question will be taken as notice. However, I am wondering what happens when members of the other place lose their buttons. Is there a replacement fee?

Senator Guay: To answer the Leader of the Government, if they lose their buttons, they have to pay a considerable fee to get a second one.

Senator Denis: I have a supplementary question. I have in my hand a pencil with the words "House of Commons" on it. This pencil is given away in the other place. Perhaps we could be provided with pencils with the word "Senate" printed on them.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would not like to see the Question Period become a discussion devoted in any great measure to buttons, trinkets, pencils and novelties. I am sure that the Internal Economy Committee will consider, in an appropriate fashion, the comments that have been made.

PROPOSED NHL AND WHA MERGER—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. For some time now there has been talk of a merger between the NHL and WHA hockey clubs. In this connection, in a pre-election statement, the government promised Quebec City and the city of Edmonton $5 million to enlarge their arenas if the two leagues are merged into one. Now, we heard recently, following a meeting of the directors of both leagues, that their idea of the proposed merger has been set aside.

Senator Langlois: The matter has not been settled yet.

Senator Asselin: Wait till I finish my question. It seems that the directors who were most opposed to that merger were the owners of the Canucks hockey club of Vancouver. It has been reported that Montreal followed suit, that is Molson Breweries of Montreal who own the Canadiens. If there is no merger, will the government honour its promise of a $5 million grant to the cities concerned to enlarge their arenas? If this were not justified, could the $5 million promised to Edmonton and Quebec City be granted the minor leagues to help amateur hockey in Canada?

• (2110)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand this evening that again there is some indication that there may be an expansion of the NHL to include Canadian cities. I understand there have been discussions in Toronto this day on the subject of expansion and there are indications that these meetings have been productive. Beyond that I am not prepared to offer comments.

It should be pointed out, however, that the reported opposition to expansion of at least Montreal and Vancouver—

Senator Asselin: Vancouver first.

Senator Perrault: No. I think the record should be put straight, because I think that certain unfair comments may have been made about the attitude of the Montreal Canadiens and the Vancouver Canucks hockey teams. From reports, I understand that the draft proposal brought in for discussion by the NHL owners the other day had been revised somewhat the preceding evening. It is reported that the entry terms brought forward were far more stringent than had been agreed to in meetings the previous day. I understand that two Canadian franchises—Vancouver and Montreal—insisted that the WHA teams should not be brought in on a poor relation basis and literally forced to enter the league as second-class members. In any case, the facts ultimately will spell out the truth of the situation. I believe they may show that the Canadian owners of the Vancouver and Montreal NHL franchises have indeed been constructive proponents of further NHL expansion into Canadian cities.

The facts will show, ultimately, I believe, that some of the harsh judgments that have been rendered in recent days may have been unfair. I happen to know one of the Canadian negotiators involved in the discussion of NHL expansion, and I know that his attitude throughout has been extremely realistic and positive. His view is that these new Canadian entries should be welcomed on terms that are fair both for the cities seeking entry and for the league itself.

[Translation]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, if I may add a word to the answer of the leader, I wonder if my honourable friend Senator Asselin heard Mr. Jacques Courtois last Saturday on Hockey Night in Canada. He explained why the Montreal Canadiens and other Canadian teams had rejected the expansion of the National Hockey League to include teams of the World Hockey Association, stating that the refusal was due to the fact that the American clubs wanted to share with Canadian clubs the television revenue in Canada. This was the main reason for the refusal of Canadian clubs. I think that aspect should not be forgotten because Mr. Jacques Courtois, being the president of the Canadian hockey club, knew what he was talking about.

Senator Asselin: I rise on a point of order, honourable senators, because I particularly want to know whether the pre-election promise to give $5 million to Quebec City and Edmonton still holds or, if the merger does not occur, will that promise be forgotten? On the other hand, has such a sum been paid to other amateur hockey organizations to promote hockey in Canada? However, if the government decides to give $5 million to Quebec City and Edmonton, would it not be time for the Canadian government and the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) to intervene in that matter and settle the problem of the merger of both leagues and other related matters. If the government undertakes to give $5 million because of its concern about the matter, is it only an election promise or is the government really interested in making progress?

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES—NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE FRANCHISES—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in answer to a question asked by Senator Molson, I am prepared to make a short statement at this time on the subject of NHL franchises. The first part of the question was:

1. Are the four cities of Winnipeg, Hamilton, Quebec City and Edmonton the only cities to be considered for a grant of several million dollars?

The four cities that have been promised support for the development or renovation of their arenas have been actively engaged over the past year in negotiations to secure NHL franchises. Hamilton only recently indicated an interest in this area. It was necessary to reply at this time to those cities attempting to secure NHL franchises because of the meetings that are being held with the NHL expansion committee—I understand that a meeting has been under way today in Toronto—which indicated that a decision on expansion could be made in the near future. One of the major criteria required by the NHL relating to franchises is that arenas be available with minimum seating capacities of 15,000. If these Canadian cities are not able to show in their applications that seating or plans with available funding are available, then they cannot be considered for these franchises.

2. If so, does that not discriminate against any other city which might expect to work towards entry into the National Hockey League?

In the future any city that could work towards an NHL franchise would be given the same consideration. Again, at this time only the cities mentioned have indicated any interest in bidding for NHL franchises.

3. Will the government give equal treatment to Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal, cities which previously financed their own arenas at great cost?

Financial consideration was given to Vancouver when they built the Pacific Coliseum. Money was made available for municipally owned arenas but would not be available for Toronto and Montreal where they are owned by the private sector.

4. In view of the financial losses to be expected in the cities mentioned for capital grants, has the government given any undertaking to provide annual subsidies to the operations so that the thousands of people who build their hopes and pride on those franchises will not be misled and bitterly disappointed?

Because the arenas in Quebec, Winnipeg, Edmonton and the proposed one in Hamilton are municipally owned, and because the mayors in each of these cities is supporting the proposal, it is assumed that operational costs have been responsibly examined as they relate to those municipalities. In addition, the government, in making the offer to these cities, has stipulated that they will be available only if an NHL franchise is secured. That appears to be at least a reasonable prospect, I understand, as a result of today's meeting. This recognizes the importance of having a major tenant in a building this size to assist in defraying the operating costs to the community.

It should be added, however, when honourable senators talk about amateur sport, that federal government funds are available for other cities and areas which are successful in hosting international events and events of national significance. The Olympics in Montreal, and the Commonwealth Games in Edmonton, have left those cities with very high-class sports facilities. Vancouver is currently interested in hosting international games and the federal government would make available one-third of the cost of providing suitable facilities. Groups in Calgary are going after a future Winter Olympics, and they might also qualify.

There have been complaints that these funds could be better spent on community sports projects. At a meeting of recreation ministers from across Canada earlier this year the provinces made it clear that they wanted the federal government to recognize that it was the provinces that had the primary responsibility for community recreation. The federal government has recognized this request.

● (2120)

While on the subject of sports, let me say that many senators will have watched recent events at the Canada Winter Games at Brandon with a great deal of interest and pride. Thanks to the Ministry of Fitness and Amateur Sport, more Canadians are enjoying more sports than ever before.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Adams for the second reading of Bill C-28, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, first of all, I wish to congratulate Senator Willie Adams on his maiden speech, which he delivered last evening as the mover of the motion for the second reading of Bill C-28.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: As a member of the Northwest Territories Council for several years, he explained very lucidly the need for broader representation of the native peoples and various areas, many very remote from Yellowknife, the capital of the Northwest Territories.

From Senator Adams' experience in Rankin Inlet we have a better understanding of the problems of the government of vast expanses inhabited by small numbers of native peoples and whites scattered in pockets, often isolated, far from each other, and with poor communication and poor transportation. The Inuit—that is, the Eskimos—Indians and Métis speak different languages, have different cultures and practise a different way of life from the whites, who have settled mainly in the larger centres. It is obvious that the task of the administration of the Northwest Territories is complex and difficult. The purpose of this bill is to provide for better representation on the Council, headed by a commissioner appointed by the Minister of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in Ottawa.

Clause 1 provides the Commissioner in Council of the Northwest Territories with the power to make ordinances:

—to increase or decrease the number of members of the Council but the number shall not be fewer than fifteen or greater than twenty-five.

This will bring the Northwest Territories into line with the Yukon, which has had this power since 1974.

Clause 2 of the bill merely validates an ordinance passed by the Commissioner in Council last October 27, in anticipation that this bill would be enacted before the term of the Council expires on March 31 of this year, which is the end of this month. The Council's amending ordinance describes 22 electoral districts, an increase of seven over the present Council of 15 members. This bill would give retroactive approval of that ordinance.

Because of the procrastination of the federal government, members of the Territorial Council came to Ottawa just prior to Christmas to prod the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development into accelerating the passage of Bill C-28. The minister finally proceeded with the second reading on February 16, asking the other house to pass the bill through the three stages that day. The New Democrat Party refused this plea of the minister and the bill went to committee. It was reported back on March 8 without amendment, was read the third time and passed by the other house without further debate.

Honourable senators, the charge being brought about by this piece of legislation was forced on the government by the Council of the Northwest Territories, which passed an ordinance on October 27 last. It was obvious to the members of the Council, as it should be to us, that this vast sparsely populated territory could not be fairly and adequately represented by only 15 members. Thus, the territory was divided into 22 electoral districts, adding seven more members to the Council and giving more representation to the native Inuit, Indians and Métis. This has been long overdue. Accepting this measure as a right step in the right direction toward self-government and eventually provincial status for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, we on this side of the chamber fully endorse this legislation. We see no need at this time for this bill to go to committee, and give approval for its speedy passage.

I would be remiss, however, if I did not say something about the future of these northern territories. The Northwest Territories form about 35 per cent of Canada's total area—greater than the combined area of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan—and the Yukon is equal in area to the four Atlantic provinces. Together, these northern territories form 40 per cent of the land area of Canada. Geological surveys have indicated that Canada's northern territories are potentially extremely rich in mineral deposits, oil and gas, the exploitation of which will greatly improve the economy of our country.

The northern pipeline, as senators know, is now in its final planning stage. Construction should commence in the very near future, and its cost is estimated at over $42 billion—almost as much as the total federal budget. This involves the settlement of land claims and the rights of the native peoples. Although the population of this vast region is small and sparse—probably around 75,000 inhabitants—the construction of the pipeline and the expanded operation of mines will greatly increase the number of people there. Canadians coming from the south will undoubtedly demand self-government and provincial status before very much time passes.

This was foreseen by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, jointly chaired by Senator Gildas Molgat and Mark MacGuigan, M.P., which, after hearings across Canada, including the northern territories, tabled its report in 1972. The following recommendations were submitted:

69. The objective of Government policy for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories should be the fostering of self-government and provincial status.

70. The provisions of the British North America Act, 1871, section 2, which provide for the admission of new provinces by action of the Federal Government alone, should be continued, provided that no territory should become a province without its consent.

71. The Yukon and the Northwest Territories should each be entitled to representation in the Senate.

To the credit of the government, the last recommendation was implemented, and now one representative for each of these territories sits in this chamber—Senator Paul Lucier since 1975, and since 1977 Senator Willie Adams, who introduced Bill C-28. However, the aforementioned joint parliamentary committee recommended the appointment of two senators for each territory. Under the constitutional rule that a province cannot have fewer members in the House of Commons than the Senate, it would lead to an increase in the number of members of Parliament, and thus give better representation for each of these territories. This would vastly improve communications between Ottawa and these territories at the parliamentary level, which is highly desirable at this time of tremendous economic developments in the north.

● (2130)

Honourable senators, although larger representation on the Territorial Council will surely be of some benefit to it in discharging many of its responsibilities, if additional powers are not granted soon it will invariably lead to trouble, frustration and deadlock. Canadian citizens living in northern Canada should have the same rights and roles in government as the residents of the provinces. It is not enough to grant more representatives; they must also be granted additional powers resulting in responsible government.

The recommendation of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, that the Yukon and the Northwest Territories should receive self-government and eventually provincial status, must be considered seriously and gradually implemented. Our citizens in northern Canada will not tolerate colonial and second-class status for long. They must be assured that the government is taking concrete steps to bring the northern territories gradually into line with the provinces in all respects.

Bill C-28 should be regarded as a stepping-stone towards that goal. Sooner or later the Councils of these territories will be demanding to be converted into legislative assemblies. One thing for certain is that their governments will have little difficulty in raising sufficient taxes. The development of the rich resources will provide more than adequate revenue for governments to promote a high standard of living for the citizens.

The senators and members of Parliament representing these vast regions have a just cause to fight for in the Canadian Parliament. As a member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada and a member of the Special Joint Committee on Immigration, I visited the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory in 1971 and 1975 where, at the hearings, I raised and discussed the issues of responsible government and provincial status for these regions and found that the witnesses were preponderantly in favour. As a member of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline, I am keenly interested in the development of self-government in the Canadian north.

I am sure that many members of the Senate and the House of Commons will support efforts to achieve this goal. We are looking forward to our two colleagues, Senator Willie Adams and Senator Paul Lucier, to be strong advocates of the rights of the peoples of the territories, who have in many ways been neglected by the federal government and Parliament.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Adams: moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline on Bill S-12, to amend the National Energy Board Act, which was presented on March 8, 1979.

Senator Olson moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, at this somewhat late hour, I have no intention of repeating the speech I made when I introduced Bill S-12 in this chamber. I do have an obligation, however, to report to the Senate on what happened at the committee meetings. During the course of the meetings we heard testimony from the Canadian Petroleum Association, TransCanada Pipelines Limited, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and from Unifarm, a major farm organization located in Alberta.

In addition to those appearances before the committee in a formal manner, we also discussed informally the bill with the Foothills group of companies and Consumers Gas. I wish to advise the Senate also that we mailed approximately 800 copies of the bill, along with explanatory notes, to a number of organizations across Canada which are interested in the legislation, including those prospective landowners along the route of the Northern Pipeline.

The suggestions made by the many witnesses who appeared before the committee both in a formal and informal manner, were very constructive. You will note that there are some 22 amendments contained in this report, some of which are of a substantive nature, but mostly they are for clarification purposes to improve, I think, the administration of these clauses in the National Energy Board Act, if and when they become law.

I am required to make a brief introduction of the subject matter for the record so that those reading today's Hansard will understand the main purpose of the bill.

Bill S-12 contains amendments to the National Energy Board Act in two main areas, the first of which deals with the approval by the board of a plan, profile and book of reference which, of course, is the specific route of the pipeline. Bill S-12 requires that at this stage the landowners be notified that the land will be required for the pipeline and given the right to make objections to the National Energy Board as to the final location of the route.

The second area deals with the methods of acquiring the lands by the company for the construction of the pipeline.

• (2140)

Bill S-12 deletes the reference in the National Energy Board Act to the Railway Act, and introduced a whole new arbitration procedure in order to strengthen the position of the landowner in negotiations with the company. The bill was referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline for consideration. The committee, as I said, held public hearings and received representations from various interested groups that I have mentioned, both in terms of petroleum associations, companies that are involved in a major way, and the farmers' organization, of course, which constitutes the other side in the negotiations that go on when easements are required.

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline suggests that the Senate now adopt 22 amendments to Bill S-12. Some of these amendments, I have to say, such as amendments 3, 12 and 13, represent an improvement in the wording only of the bill, while others, of a more substantive nature, clarify its intent. I would like to advise honourable senators that they can find all these amendments at page 714 of Hansard or page 326 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate if they want to go through them with me.

I understand that under rule 80, on every report of amendments to a bill made by a committee, the senator presenting the report shall explain to the Senate the basis for and the effect of each amendment. I can promise you at the outset, however, that I am going to be very brief in giving you these explanations. While I am not sure what the procedure may be, it seems to me that it would be appropriate if senators who have questions about any of these amendments were to interrupt me and ask for clarification. I realize that that gets into an area usually handled by a committee, but whatever the procedure senators may wish to adopt—whether they wish to question me during my speech or to hold their questions until I have finished—is agreeable to me.

Amendment 1 inserts in the bill a requirement for publication of the notice referred to in the proposed subsection 29.1(1), dealing with notification to the landowners of their right—and this was not provided before—to make representations to the National Energy Board prior to the board's approval of the plan, profile and book of reference. Honourable senators will recall that this was provided for in Bill C-25 of the last session, the Northern Pipeline Act, in section 18.1 of schedule III. We are now putting it into the National Energy Board Act with these amendments so that that notification will be available to prospective landowners who will be asked for easements in all future pipelines. So this particular amendment does not apply specifically to the northern pipeline, but it will apply to others.

Amendment 2 specifies more precisely the timing of the establishment of the arbitration committee. We agreed to this because the arbitration committee needs to be in existence earlier than we had anticipated when we drafted the bill. There are a number of reasons I could give for that but, as I said, I do not want to go into a great amount of detail. The amendment does not change anything except that, as I said, it specifies more precisely the requirements for the establishment of the arbitration committee.

Amendment 3 simply represents a change in wording for the purposes of clarification.

Amendment 4 would restrict the right of entry of an inspector, and, indeed, of the arbitration committee, to the property it is proposed to take. In other words, the way it was written before, the arbitration committee could enter upon the lands for inspection, but the reference was to "all of the lands". What we are now doing is to restrict them to an inspection of the lands or strip that it is proposed to take for the purposes of the line of pipe.

Amendment 5 clarifies the purposes for which the company may be granted to right of entry only. This is more or less for clarification.

Amendment 6 specifies that when substantially all claims have been disposed of by the arbitration committee the existence of the committee may be terminated, notwithstanding any pending appeals to the courts. This, of course, is provided because the company is required to pay the expenses of an arbitration committee for any specific project, and we believe that there is a time, at the completion of the project, when substantially all of the claims have been settled, when the minister may, in his discretion, terminate that committee. Honourable senators will also know that there are other arbitration procedures provided for, even after an arbitration committee for a specific project has gone out of existence. We think it only fair that a company should not go on paying the costs of an arbitration committee for what might turn out to be months and years after the project is completed, even though there may be some matters still before the courts.

Amendment 7, and also, indeed, amendment 17, differentiate more clearly between the option of one lump sum payment and a series of periodic or annual payments, subject to review.

Amendment 8 adds a provision to one of the clauses in the agreement between the landowner and the company to exempt the company from liability for damages arising from negligence or wilful misconduct on the part of the owner. Prior to this amendment the section could have been interpreted as meaning that the company was responsible even though there had been gross negligence or wilful misconduct on the part of the owner of the land, and we believe that if these things can be established the company ought not to be responsible for the consequences of such behaviour on the part of the landowner.

Amendment 9 replaces the word "pipeline" in paragraph 73(2)(e) with the words "line of pipe or other facilities", because of the wide definition of "pipeline" in the National Energy Board Act. The definition of the word "pipeline" includes everything that belongs to the pipeline, even to the extent, as suggested by someone, of the office furniture. We have therefore used the words "line of pipe or other facilities", rather than the word "pipeline", because of that definition.

[Senator Olson.]

Amendment 10 has the purpose of indicating clearly that a certified appraisal is not necessary at the time of notice. We did use the word "evaluation" as well as the word "appraisal", and there was some concern that this could lead to a definition or an interpretation that each parcel of land had to be evaluated or appraised by a certified appraiser, as I think he is called, which was not the intention at all. It may be that when they get to court in a dispute, the court or the arbitration committee itself may want to have an appraisal done by a certified appraiser; but we do not believe that the company ought to be required to provide a certified appraisal of each parcel of land when making the initial offer of compensation to the landowner. That is why we have changed the wording.

Amendment 11 clarifies the wording so as to enable the negotiator to enter upon lands in order to make an inspection. The purpose here, again, is simply to clean up the wording.
